SUCH AN ACT as is described in this paragraph from the Christian Union ought to be known by all men, and remembered to the everlasting honor of the actor: "The new biography of Chief-Justice Chase, by Mr. Schuckers, contains an anecdote that would be profitable reading for some of our public men. When Secretary of the Treasury, Jay Cooke bought for him three hundred shares of railway stock, which he agreed to take, expecting to pay for them by the sale of a farm. A few weeks later, Mr. Cooke wrote him that he had sold the stock at an advance of $4,200, and enclosed a check for that sum. Mr. Chase wrote courteously in reply, stating that the farm had not been sold, so that he had been unable to pay the original price of the stock; that he had not consented to the purchase with a view to a re-sale; that he could not accept Mr. Cooke's offer to regard the money paid by him for the stock as a temporary loan; and that he accordingly returned the check. He says that he had taken office with the resolution to avoid every act that might cause suspicion that he used his official powers to affect the markets for the private advantage of anybody. He concludes: 'It is essential for me to be right as well as to seem right, and to seem right as well as to be right.' It is such a sense of honor as this, a more delicate sentiment than a mere unwillingness to steal, that we need to have in all our public servants."

The Salem Witchcraft.

[The following account of the famous Salem witchcraft delusion, written a little later by one of the deluded, Rev. John Hale, the first minister at Beverly, is here copied directly from "MAGNALIA CHRISTI AMERICANA: or, The Ecclesiastical History of New England, from its First Planting in the Year 1620, unto the Year of our Lord 1698. In Seven Books. By the Reverend and Learned COTTON MATHER, M.A., and Pastor of the North Church in Boston, New England. London: Printed for Thomas Parkhurst, at the Bible and Three Crowns in Cheapside. MDCCII:" Book VI., pages 79–83. We preserve the spelling, and so forth, as nearly as possible.]

THE FOURTEENTH EXAMPLE.

To conclude our Wonders of the Invisible World, there will doubtless be expected an Account of the Wonders that afflicted New England in the Year 1692. Now having in my Hands a most unexceptionable Account thereof written by Mr. John Hales, I will here content my self with the Transcribing of that. And I will assure the Reader that he hath now to do with a Writer, who would not for a World be guilty of over-doing the Truth in a History of this importance.

SADDUCISMUS DEBELLATUS.

§ 1. In the latter end of the Year 1691. Mr. Paris, Pastor of the Church in Salem-Village had a Daughter of Nine, and a Niece of about Eleven Years of Age, sadly afflicted of they knew not what Distempers: And tho' he made his Application to Physicians, yet still they grew worse. At length one Physician gave his Opinion That they were under an Evil Hand. This the Neighbors took up, and concluded, they were bewitch'd. He had also an Indian Manservant, and his Wife, who afterwards confess'd that without the Knowledge of their Master or Mistress, they had taken some of the afflicted Persons Urine, and mixing it with Meal, had made a Cake, and bak'd it, to find out the Witch, as they said. After this, the afflicted Persons cry'd out of the Indian Woman nam'd Tituba, that she did pinch, prick, and grievously torment them; and that they saw her here and there, where no body else could; yea, they could tell where she was, and what she did when out of their Humane Sight. These Children were bitten and pinch'd by invisible Agents; their Arms, Necks, and Backs turn'd this way and that way, and return'd back again; so as it was impossible for them to do of themselves, and beyond the power of any Epileptick Fits, or natural Diseases to effect.

Sometimes they were taken dumb, their Mouths stopp'd, their Throats choak'd, their Limbs rack'd and tormented, so as might move an Heart of Stone to sympathize with them, with Bowels of Compassion for them. I will not enlarge in the Description of their cruel Sufferings, because they were in all things afflicted as bad as John Goodwin's Children at Boston in the Year 1689. So that he that will read Mr. Mather's Book of Memorable Providences, may read part of what these Children, and afterwards sundry grown Persons suffer'd by the Hand of Satan at Salem-Village and Parts adjacent, An. 169 1-2. Yet there was more in these Sufferings than in those at Boston, by Pins invisibly stuck into their Flesh, pricking with Irons, &c., as is in part publish'd in a Book printed 1692, viz. The Wonders of the Invisible World.

Mr. Paris feeling the distress'd Condition of his Family, desir'd the Presence of some worthy Gentlemen of Salem, and some Neighbour-Ministers, to consult together at his House; who, when they came, and had enquir'd diligently into the Sufferings of the afflicted, concluded they were preternatural, and fear'd the Hand of Satan was in them.

§ 2. The advice given to Mr. Paris about them, was, That he should sit still and wait upon the Providence of God, to see what Time might discover, and to be much in Prayer for the Discovery of what was yet secret. They also examin'd Tituba, who confess'd the making a Cake, as is above-mentioned, and said her Mistress in her own Country was a Witch, and had taught her some means to be us'd for the Discovery of a Witch, and for prevention of being bewitch'd, but said that she her self was not a Witch.

§ 3. Soon after this, there were two or three Private Fasts at the Minister's House; one of which was kept by sundry Neighbour Ministers; and after this, another in publick at the Village; and several Days afterwards of Public Humiliation, during these Molestations, not only there, but in other Congregations for them: and one General Fast, by order of the General Court, observ'd throughout the Colony, to seek the Lord, that he would rebuke Satan, and be a Light unto his People in this Day of Darkness. But I return to these Troubles. In a short time after, other Persons who were of age to be Witnesses, were molested by Satan, and in their Fits cried out upon Tituba, and Goody O., and S. G., that they or Spectres in their Shapes, did grievously torment them. Some of their Village Neighbours complain'd unto the Magistrates at Salem, desiring they would come and examine the Afflicted and the Accus'd together; the which they did: The effect of which Examination was, that Tituba confess'd she was a Witch; and that she, with the two others accus'd, did torment and bewitch the Complainers; and that these, with two others, whose Names she knew not, had their Witch Meetings together, relating the times when, and places where, they met, with many other Circumstances elsewhere to be seen at large. Upon this, the said Tituba and O. and G. were committed to Prison upon suspicion of acting Witchcraft. After this, the said Tituba was again examined in Prison, and own'd her first Confession in all points, and then was herself afflicted, and complain'd of her Fellow-Witches tormenting of her for her Confession, and accusing them; and being search'd by a Woman, she was found to have upon her Body the Marks of the Devil's wounding her.

§ 4. Here were these things rendred her Confession credible:—

1. That at this Examination she answered every Question just as she did at the first. And it was thought, that if she had feign'd her Confession, she could not have remember'd her Answers so exactly. A Lyar, we say, had need have a good Memory: But Truth being always consistent with it self, is the same to day as it was yesterday.

2. She seemed very penitent for her Sin in covenanting with the Devil.

3. She became a Sufferer her self, and, as she said, for her Confession.

4. Her Confession agreed exactly (which was afterwards verify'd in the other Confessors) with the Accusations of the Afflicted.

Soon after, these afflicted Persons complain'd of other Persons afflicting of them in their Fits, and the number of the Afflicted and the Accus'd began to increase. And the Success of Tituba's Confession encourag'd those in Authority to examine others that were suspected; and the Event was, that more confess'd themselves guilty of the Crimes they were suspected for. And thus was the matter driven on.

§ 5. I observ'd in the Prosecution of these Affairs, that there was in the Justices, Judges, and others concern'd, a conscientous Endeavor to do the thing that was right; and to that end they consulted the Precedents of former times, and Precepts laid down by learn'd Writers about Witchcraft; as Keeble on the Common Law, Chayst. Conjuration (an Author approv'd by the Twelve Judges of our Nation:) Also Sir Matthew Hale's Trials of Witches, printed An. 1682. Glanvil's Collection of sundry Trials in England and Ireland in the Year 1658, 61, 63, 64, and 81. Bernard's Guide to Jury-men; Baxter's and R. B. their Histories about Witches and their Discoveries; C. Mather's Memorable Providences relating to Witchcrafts, printed 1685.

But that which chiefly carry'd on this matter to such an Height, was the increasing of Confessors until they amounted to near upon fifty: and Four or Six of them upon their Trials own'd their Guilt of this Crime, and were condemn'd for the same but not executed. And many of the Confessors confirmed their Confessions with very strong Circumstances; as their exact agreement with the Accusations of the Afflicted, their punctual agreement with their Fellow-Confessors, their relating the Times when they covenanted with Satan, and the Reasons that moved them thereunto; their Witch-Meetings, and that they had their Mock-Sacraments of Baptism and the Supper, in some of them; their signing the Devil's Book, and some shew'd the Scars of the Wounds which they said were made to fetch Blood with to sign the Devil's Book; and some said they had Imps to suck them, and shewed Sores raw, where they said they were suck'd by them.

§ 7. I shall give the Reader a Taste of these things in a few Instances. The Afflicted complain'd that the Spectres which vex'd them, urged them to set their hands to a Book, represented to them (as to them it seem'd) with threatenings of great torments if they sign'd not, and Promises of Ease if they obey'd. Among these D. H., as she said (which sundry others confess'd afterwards), being overcome by the Extremity of her pains, did sign the Book presented, and had the promis'd Ease, and immediately upon it a Spectre in her Shape afflicted another Person, and said, I have sign'd the Book, and have Ease: now do you sign, and so shall you have Ease! And one day this afflicted Person pointed at a certain place in the Room, and said There is D. H. Upon which a Man with his Rapier struck at the Place, tho' he saw no Shape; and the Afflicted called out, saying, You have given her a small Prick about the Eye. Soon after this, the said D. H. confess'd her self to be made a Witch, by signing the Devil's Book, as abovesaid, and declar'd that she had afflicted the Maid that complain'd of her, and in doing of it, had receiv'd Two Wounds by a Sword or Rapier; a small one about the Eye, which she shew'd to the Magistrates, and a bigger on the Side, of which she was search'd by a discreet Woman, who reported that D. H. had on her Side the Sign of a Wound newly heal'd. This D. H. confessed that she was at a Witch-meeting at Salem Village, where were many Persons that she nam'd, some of whom were in Prison then, or soon after, upon suspicion of Witchcraft; and she said G. B. preach'd to them, and such a Woman was their Deacon, and there they had a Sacrament.

§ 8. Several others after this, confess'd the same things with D. H. In particular Goody F. said, that she, with two others, (one of whom acknowledg'd the same) rode from Andover to the same Village Witch-meeting, upon a Stick above the Ground, and that in the Way the Stick brake, and gave the said F. a Fall, whereby, said she, I got a Fall and Hurt, of which I am still sore. I hapned to be present in Prison when this F. own'd again her former Confession to the Magistrates —— I asked her if she rode to the Meeting on a Stick? She said, Yea. I inquired what she did for Victuals: She answered, That she carried Bread and Cheese in her Pocket, and that she and the Andover Company came to the Village before the Meeting began, and sat down together under a Tree, and eat their Food; and that she drank Water out of a Brook to quench her Thirst; and that the Meeting was upon a plain Grassy Place, by which was a Cart-path, in which were the Tracks of Horses-Feet; and she also told me how long they were going and returning, and sometime after, told me she had some Trouble upon her Spirit; and when I enquired what, she said, she was in fear that G. B. and M. C. would kill her; for they appeared unto her (in Spectre, for their Persons were kept in other Rooms in the Prison) and brought a Sharp-pointed Iron, like a Spindle, but four-square, and Threatened to stabb her to death, because she had confessed her Witchcraft, and told of them that they were with her; and M. C. above-named was the Person that made her a Witch. About a Month after, the said F. took occasion to tell me the same Story of her Fears that G. B. and E. C. would kill her; so that the thing was much on her Spirit.

§ 9. It was not long before M. L. Daughter of the said F. confess'd that She rode with her Mother to the said Witch-meeting, and confirm'd the Substance of her Mother's Confession. At another time M. L. junior, the Grand-daughter aged about 17 Years, confesses the Substance of what her Grand-mother and Mother had related, and declares that when they, with E. C. rode on a Stick or Pole in the Air, she the said Grand-daughter, with R. C. rode upon another (and the said R. C. acknowledged the same) and that they set their Hands to the Devil's Book: and (inter alia) said, O Mother, why did you give me to the Devil? twice or thrice over. The Mother said, she was sorry at the heart for it; it was through that wicked one. Her Daughter had her repent and call upon God, and said, Oh Mother! your wishes are now come to pass; for how often have you wished that the Devil would fetch me away alive! and then said, Oh, my Heart will break within me! Then She wept bitterly, crying out, O Lord comfort me, and bring out all the Witches. And she said to her Grandmother, Oh Grandmother, why did you give me to the Devil? Why did you perswade me? O Grandmother, do not deny it. Then the Grandmother gave account of several things about their Confederates and Acts of Witchcraft, too long to rehearse. Moreover, another declared, that she with Widow S. went to Captain W. S. and the said S. gave him a Blow with a great Stick, and yet was to him invisible. Captain W. declar'd he had a sore Blow, as if with a great Stick, but saw no body. The Widow S. denied that she struck him. Then M. P. the Confessor very boldly look'd up into her Face, and said, Goody S. you know you did strike him, and I saw you do it, and then told the manner how it was done, and how they came to him, and returned.

§ 10. Nextly, I will insert the Confession of a Man, about forty years of age, W. B. which he wrote himself in Prison, and sent to the Magistrates, to confirm his former Confession to them. God having call'd me to confess my Sin and Apostacy in that Fall, in giving the Devil Advantage over me, appearing to me like a Black, in the Evening, to set my hand to his Book, as I have own'd to my shame. He told me that I should not want, so doing. At Salem-Village, there being a little off the Meeting-house, about an hundred fine Blades, some with Rapiers by their sides, which was call'd (and might be more for ought I know) By B. and Bu. and the TRUMPET sounded, and, Bread and Wine which they called the Sacrament; but I had none; being carried over all upon a Stick, never being at any other Meeting. I being at Cart Saturday last all the Day, of Hay and English Corn the Devil brought my Shape to Salem, and did afflict M. S. and R. F. by clitching my Hand: And on Sabbath-day my Shape afflicted A. M. and at Night afflicted M. S. and A. M. E. J. and A. F. have been my Enticers to this great Abomination, as one hath owned and charged her other Sister with the same. And the Design was to destroy Salem-Village, and to begin at the Minister's House, and to destroy the Churches of God, and to set up Satan's Kingdom, and then all will be well.

And now I hope God hath made me in some measure sensible of my Sin and Apostacy; begging Pardon of God, and of the honorable Magistrates, and all God's People; hoping, and promising by the Help of God, to set to my Heart and Hand to do what in me lieth to destroy such wicked Worship; humbly beggying the Prayers of God's People for me, I may walk humbly under all this great Affliction, and that I may procure to my self the sure mercies of David.

Concerning this Confession, note, 1. It was his own Free Act in Prison. 2. He said (The Devil, like a black Sheep). This he had before explain'd to be like a Black Man. 3. That on a certain day was heard in the Air the Sound of a Trumpet at Salem-Village, nigh the Meeting-house, and upon all Enquiry, it could not be found that any mortal Man did sound it. 4. The Three Persons, he saith, the Devil in his Shape afflicted, had been, as to the time and manner, afflicted as he confesseth. 5. That E. J. confessed as much as W. B. chargeth her with. 6. Many others confess'd a Witch-meeting or Witch-meetings at the Village as well as he.

Note also, that these Confessors did not only witness against themselves, but against one another, and against many, if not all those that suffer'd for that Crime. As for Example: When G. B. was tried, seven or eight of these Confessors, severally call'd, said they knew the said B. and saw him at a Witch-meeting at the Village, and heard him exhort the Company to pull down the Kingdom of God, and set up the Kingdom of the Devil. He deny'd all; yet said he justify'd the Judges and Jury in condemning of him: because there were so many positive Witnesses against him; but said he dy'd by false Witnesses. M. C. had to against her two or three of her own Children, and several Neighbours, that said they were in Confederacy with her in her Witchcraft. A. F. had three of her Children, and some of the Neighbours, her own Sister, and a Servant, who confess'd themselves Witches, and said, she was in Confederacy with them. But alas, I am weary with relating Particulars: Those that would see more of this kind, let them have recourse to the Records.

§ 11. By these things you may see how this matter was carry'd on, viz. chiefly by the Complaints and Accusations of the Afflicted (Bewitch'd ones, as it was suppos'd) and then by the Confessions of the Accus'd condemning themselves and others. Yet Experience shew'd, That the more there were apprehended, the more were still afflicted by Satan; and the Number of Confessors increasing did but increase the Number of the Accused; and the executing of some, made way for the apprehending of others: For still the Afflicted complain'd of being tormented by new Objects, as the former were remov'd. So that those that were concern'd grew amaz'd at the Number and Quality of the Persons accus'd, and feared that Satan by his Wiles had enwrapped Innocent Persons under the Imputation of that Crime. And at last, it was evidently seen, that there must be a Stop put, or the Generation of the Children of God, would fall under that Condemnation. Henceforth therefore the Juries generally acquitted such as were tried, fearing they had gone too far before. And Sir William Phips the Governor, reprieved all that were condemn'd, even the Confessors as well as others. And the Confessors generally fell off from their Confession, some saying, They remembered nothing of what they had said; others said, They had belied themselves and others. Some broke Prison and ran away, and were not strictly searched after. Some acquitted, some dismissed, and one way or other, all that had been accused, were set or left at Liberty. And altho' had the Times been calm, the Condition of the Confessors might have called for a Melius inquirendum; yet, considering the Combustion and Confusion this matter had brought us unto, it was thought safer to under-do than over-do especially in matters Capital, where what is once compleated, cannot be retrieved; but what is left at one time, may be corrected at another, upon a Review and clearer Discovery of the State of the Case. Thus this matter issued somewhat abruptly.

§ 12. It may be queried, How doth it appear that there was a going too far in this Affair?

A. 1. By the Numbers of the Persons accus'd, which at length increas'd to about an hundred; and it came to be imagin'd that in a place of so much knowledge, so many in so small a compass of Land, should so abominably leap into the Devil's Lap all at once.

2. The Quality of several of the Accus'd was such, as did bespeak better things, and things that accompany Salvation; Persons, whose blameless and holy lives before did testifie for them; Persons that had taken great pains to bring up their Children in the Nurture and Admonition of the Lord; such as we had Charity for, as for our own Souls: And Charity is a Christian Duty commended to us.

3. The Number of the Afflicted daily increased until about fifty Persons were thus vex'd by the Devil. This gave just ground to suspect some Mistake, which gave advantage to the Accuser of the Brethren to make a Breach upon us.

4. It was considerable, That Nineteen were executed, and all denied the Crime to the death, and some of them were knowing Persons, and had before this been accounted blameless Livers. And, it is not to be imagin'd, but that if all had been guilty, some would have had so much Tenderness, as to seek Mercy for their Souls, in the way of Confession and Sorrow for such a Sin. And as for the Condemn'd Confessors at the Bar (they being reprieved) we had no Experience whether they would stand to their self-condemning Confessions when they came to die.

5. When this Prosecution ceas'd, the Lord so chain'd up Satan, that the Afflicted grew presently well; The Accused are generally quiet, and for five years since, we have no such Molestation by them.

6. It sways much with me, which I have since heard and read, of the like Mistakes in other Places. As in Suffolk in England, about the year 1645 was such a Prosecution, until they saw, that unless they put a stop, it would bring all into Blood and Confusion. The like hath been in France until Nine hundred were put to death. And in some other places the like. So that New England is not the only place circumvented by the Wiles of the wicked and wily Serpent in this Kind.

Wierus de Præstigiis Dæmonum, pag. 678. relates, That an Inquisitor in the Subalpine Valleys, enquir'd after Women-witches, and consum'd above an hundred in the Flames, and daily made New Offerings to Vulcan of those that needed Hellebore more than Five. Until the Countrey-People rose, and by force of Arms hinder'd him, and referr'd the matter to the Bishop. Their Husbands, Men of good Faith, affirmed, that in that very time, they said of them, that they had play'd and danc'd under a Tree, they were in Bed with them.

In Chelmsford in Essex, Anno 1645, there were thirty try'd at once before Judge Coniers, and fourteen of them hang'd and an hundred more of them detain'd in several Prisons in Suffolk and Essex.

As to our Case at Salem, I conceive it proceeded from some mistaken Principles: As, that Satan cannot assume the Shape of an Innocent Person, and in that Shape do mischief to the Bodies and Estates of Mankind: and that the Devil, when he doth harm to Persons in their Body or Estate, it is (at least, most commonly, generally and frequently) by the help of our Neighbour, some Witch in covenant with the Devil; and that when the Party suspected looks on the Parties suppos'd to be bewitch'd, and they are thereupon struck down into a Fit, as if struck with a Cudgel, it is a Proof of such a Covenant. Cum multis aliis.

The worthy Author, from whose Manuscript I have transcrib'd this Narrative, does there confute these mistaken Principles; and in his confuting of one, viz. That if the Party suspected appear in Spectre to the Afflicted, and the Afflicted give a Blow with Knife, Sword, &c. (or some other on their behalf) and the Spectre seems wounded or Bleeding, or to have their Garment torn by the Blow receiv'd; and the party Spectreally represented, be presently searched, and there is found upon their Body a Wound or Blood, even on the same part of their Body, or a Rent on the same part of the Garment which appeared on the Spectre to the Afflicted, this hath been accounted a strong Evidence to prove the Party suspected to be a Confederate with Satan in afflicting the Complainer. He hath divers notable Passages. One of them is this:

'The Person or Garment so represented to the Afflicted by the Spectre, was wounded, or bleeding, or 'cut, or rent before: And the Devil knowing this, 'represents to the Afflicted that part of the Spectre 'which answers to the Body wounded, or Garment 'rent; and then the Searchers finding such Wounds 'upon, or Rents about the Person suspected, are 'ready to conclude it was done by the Stroke at the 'Spectre, which was done before. There was at 'Chelmsford an afflicted Person, that in her Fits cried 'out against a Woman, a Neighbour, which Mr. Clark, the Minister of the Gospel there, could not be-'lieve to be guilty of such a Crime. And it hapned, 'while that Woman milked her Cow, the Cow struck 'her with one Horn upon the Forehead, and fetch'd 'Blood: And while she was thus bleeding, a Spectre 'in her Likeness appear'd to the Party afflicted; who 'pointing at the Spectre, one struck at the place, and 'the Afflicted said, You have made her Forehead bleed! 'Hereupon some went unto the Woman, and found 'her Forehead bloody, and acquainted Mr. Clark with 'it; who forthwith went to the Woman, and ask'd, 'How her Forehead became bloody? and she answer'd, 'By a Blow of the Cows Horn, as above said: Where-'by he was satisfy'd, That it was a Design of Satan to 'render an innocent Person suspected.

Another instance was at Cambridge about 40 years since. 'There was a Man much troubled in the 'Night with Cats, or the Devil in their Likeness, 'haunting of him. Whereupon he kept a Light 'burning, and a Sword by him as he lay in Bed; for 'he suspected a Widow-Woman to send these Cats or 'Imps, by Witchcraft, to bewitch him. And one 'Night as he lay in Bed, a Cat, or Imp, came within 'his Reach, and he struck her on the Back; and upon 'Enquiry he heard this Widow had a sore Back. 'This confirmed his suspicion of the Widow, he sup-'posing it came from the Wound he gave the Cat. 'But Mr. Day, the Widow's Chirurgeon, clear'd the 'matter; saying, this Widow came to him, and com-'plain'd of a Sore in her Back, and desired his Help, 'and he found it to be a Boyl, and ripen'd and heal'd 'it as he us'd to do other Boyls. But while this was 'in cure, the suppos'd Cat was wounded, as is al-'ready rehears'd. Again, I knew a Woman that was 'Spectrally represented unto an Afflicted Maid, who 'complain'd that she was in such a part of the Room; 'whereupon one struck at it with his Rapier in the 'Scabbard, and the afflicted said, You have rent her 'Gown in such a Place, and her Gown is Green. Af-'terwards this Woman was observ'd when apprehend-'ed, to have that green Gown on (which doubtless 'she would not have worn then, if she had known 'any thing of its being rent, by striking at her Spec-'tre), and there was found a Rent sow'd up, just in 'the place the Afflicted had said it was torn by the 'Scabbard in the same manner. I afterward ask'd 'this Woman how her Gown came so torn: She an-'swered, by going into such a Yard about a Year be-'fore, and such an one knew it to be so.

The Author elsewhere speaking of another mistaken Principle, takes occasion to mention the following Passage: 'I remember, when there was a great 'Discourse about Witches, a very holy Man heard his 'Wife say she desir'd a Sucking Pig; and he going to 'a Neighbour's House, saw a Sow with a Litter of 'Pigs, and took a Fancy to one of them for his Wife, 'and asked the Owner for that Pig. The Owner de-'nied him: Hereupon he went away in a great Pas-'sion, very unsuitable to such a Person; and that 'very Pig left its Dam and Company, and followed 'this Man to his home. This was observed, and it 'was supposed Satan might have some hand in it; 'taking advantage upon the Passion of so good a 'Man, to render him suspected by such an Accident, 'if he could.

Upon the whole, the Author spends whole Chapters to prove that there yet is a Witch; and he gives this Definition of one, viz, a Person, 'that having 'the free use of Reason, doth knowingly and willingly 'seek and obtain of the Devil, or of any other God, 'besides the true God Jehovah, an Ability to do or 'know strange things, or things which he cannot by 'his own Humane Abilities arrive unto. This Person 'is a Witch.

But thus much for that Manuscript.

"AUDI ALTERAM PARTEM."

Have white men born in the Southern States no "civil rights" that their Northern brethren are willing to respect?

This question has been suggested by the perusal of Mr. R. P. Hallowell's recent communication to THE INDEX, entitled "The Civil Rights Bill and the Nation."

Mr. Hallowell's caustic criticisms of the position occupied by the editor of the Nation proceed entirely from an erroneous assumption: to wit, that the whites are abundantly able to take care of themselves, and the negroes are not. Now so far is this from being the case in the States of South Carolina and Florida, on the east, and in Mississippi and Louisiana, on the west, that it might be argued with more reason that the reverse is actually true: first, because in each of these States the negroes are in possession of the powers of government (including the money power, the credit of the State, as well as the receipts of the tax-collectors); next, because the blacks are the producers and the whites are almost utterly dependent upon their labor for existence; again, because the negroes preponderate numerically; still farther, because the blacks are better fitted by nature and constitution to withstand the semi-tropical diseases of the South; last, but not least, because the freedmen are united in purpose, and working together for a common end. Born, bred, and educated within the dear old city of Boston, your correspondent can scarcely be accused of a natural bias in favor of the South; but it may not be altogether out of place to state that he has no tie of kindred, no relatives in that section, nor any pecuniary interest whatsoever.

The writer first made acquaintance with slaves and slaveholders (the planters and freedmen of to-day) during the Civil War, and as a volunteer officer in the United States service, in the coast districts of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, immediately after the capture of Port Royal and the occupation of Beaufort and Fernandina. From this date down to the final capitulation of the Confederate forces, and later, for upwards of four years (from 1861 up to December, 1865), he passed the greater portion of his time in the cotton States. In 1865, he was required to make an extended tour through the States of the South, occupying several months, and comprehending nearly every town or city of consequence in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Tennessee, and from Pilatka in eastern Florida to San Antonio de Bexar in western Texas; he everywhere availed himself of his daily and hourly opportunites of conversation with the negroes, in order to ascertain, if possible, their hopes and fears, ideas, intentions, and possibilities. The result of these frequent conversations, observations, and experiences was given to the public in pamphlet form by an association of gentlemen in Massachusetts, with whom the writer was in communication; was endorsed and commended by the Hon. Charles Sumner in his celebrated "whitewashing" speech before the Senate of the United States; was republished in England; and the predictions therein contained have been since fully verified by the subsequent history of "Reconstruction."

The writer was the first witness summoned before the special joint committee of fifteen to "inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called Confederate States of America, and report whether they or any of them are entitled to be represented in either House of Congress"—that memorable committee at the head of which "Thad" Stevens presided, and upon whose report was based the entire scheme of reconstruction adopted and adhered to by Congress up to the present time. Among the members of that committee were Senators Fessenden, of Maine, Grimes, of Iowa, and Harris, of New York, and Congressmen (at that time) E. B. Washburn, of Illinois, Morrill, of Vermont, Bingham, of Ohio, Conkling, of New York, Blow, of Missouri, and Boutwell, of Massachusetts—most of whom have since "gone up higher" in one sense or another. Thus much, lest it might be asserted that the writer's acquaintance with the subject was too superficial to deserve consideration.

In the firm and abiding belief that justice requires an impartial examination of the situation in the Southern States, regarded as well from the point of view occupied by very nearly the entire population of native whites as from that of their fellow-citizens of African descent, the writer desires respectfully to sum up, for the benefit of THE INDEX subscribers, the impressions produced by a somewhat prolonged sojourn in the States of Mississippi and Lousiana during the present season.

After an interval of nine years, curiosity to see for himself the precise changes effected by the emancipation of the slaves induced your correspondent to revisit the districts of the Southern country with which he had been most familiar in war-times; and, during the spring and early summer he has passed some time in an investigation of the social and political status of the population of the Mississippi Valley, including not merely the chief cities from Saint Louis to New Orleans, as Memphis and Vicksburg, but the sparsely settled sections, such as the famous belt of cotton plantations about Lake Washington, in Mississippi—the very heart of the cotton district,—down to the superb sugar-plantations of Louisiana, situated on "the lower coast," between New Orleans and the Gulf of Mexico.

The general result of the writer's careful study of the position of affairs, in those sections where the negroes are in a majority, may be given in the expression of the opinion that the solitary hope of restoring any vestige of prosperity to those distressed and desolated regions consists in the proclamation of martial law, and the immediate assumption by the administration at Washington, through its military officials, of all the ordinary powers of government!

Volumes would scarcely suffice to do justice to the subject of the inevitable and impending conflict between the whites and blacks. Suffice it to say that no unprejudiced observer of the course of events can be an eye-witness of the constantly increasing jealousy, enmity, and antagonism, without becoming convinced that the two races, Africans and Anglo-Saxons, can never assimilate for generations to come, if even then. Out of the mouths of the negroes themselves the writer has repeatedly heard the opinion that "blacks and whites were never made to live together." It is a fact, which every intelligent visitor to the Southern States can easily verify for himself, that a profound and nearly unanimous conviction exists among the freedmen to the effect that they, or their children, or their children's children, are destined ultimately to extirpate the whites from among them!

The writer does not hesitate to assert that the blacks are working together in perfect unison for this end. They refuse to make improvements upon property, or to permit them to be made by owners, for the purpose of depreciating it to such a point that they can obtain possession for little or nothing. The recent advice of Fred. Douglass to the five millions—more or less—of his race in the Southern States is likely to be acted upon without unnecessary delay; namely, to concentrate themselves within the States of South Carolina and Florida on the east, and in Mississippi and Louisiana on the West. Meantime the white inhabitants of these four States are emigrating (wherever they possess the means to enable them to do so), and the young men especially are leaving their homes and birth-places with no expectation of ever returning again.

In view of these facts, is it wise or prudent, just or generous, in the people of the North to blink the questions certain to be precipitated upon future generations? If an artificial and arbitrary code of so-called civil rights be prematurely forced upon the eight or ten millions of Southern whites, the perpetuation of race-antagonism is insured beyond a doubt. Must not the black man, in the end, stand or fall, survive or perish, on his own intrinsic merit and ability? Is it not time that he should manifest his capacity? Already have the "Sea Islands" upon the Atlantic coast been utterly abandoned to the negroes by their former owners; and what has been their fate in the hands of the freedmen? The country has relapsed almost into its primeval condition! A barbarism akin to that of Hayti is springing up among the new generation of blacks born since 1860. This is admitted by the more intelligent among the negroes themselves. It is a common saying among the nice old "aunties" of former days that "the little niggers" now growing up are of "no account." For every exception to this rule it would be easy to produce a hundred half-wild, half-naked savages who will neither obey their parents nor any one else.

It is probably already too late to save the rich "bottom" lands of the Mississippi Valley, for half of them are already "gone back into the bush," deserted by their former owners, fences and buildings destroyed, levees down, subject to overflow annually, etc., etc. Hundreds of thousands of acres have been permitted to be sold for taxes, and are now owned by the States. The same will be true of the rice-plantations of the Atlantic coast and the Gulf, and also of the Floridian marshes and everglades; these will have to be relinquished to the negroes, who will inhabit them much as did the American Indians, becoming their sole possessors and occupants, and subsisting in great part by hunting and fishing. Let the voters of the Northern States once plainly comprehend the logic of the situation, and their good sense will at once show them the remedy. It is simply the false diagnosis of the disease that prevents a speedy cure. Left to himself, the former slave prefers to exist in idleness as best he can. He abhors work, if he can avoid it. Rather than work for wages above the amount to sustain existence he will live a semi-barbarian all his days.

Now, legislation for the purpose of placing this good-natured, naturally harmless, but far from perfect, human being on a social equality with his former masters, will not really serve to elevate his nature or character one whit, but may possibly tend to degrade the white man. An even-handed justice, while giving the negro every opportunity for self-improvement, would not therefore find it necessary to exterminate the whites. "Mixed schools" means only annihilation of the possibility of public education in every Southern State. In one word, the "Civil Rights Bill" is another name for anarchy, desperation, revolution—civil war! Everywhere the blacks are only too willing to assert their rights, but in order to maintain them, they must learn better to understand the corresponding responsibilities, of which they have at present only the faintest idea. All the legislation in the world cannot make Germans into Frenchmen. How much more difficult to transform five millions of negroes into the equals, socially and politically, of ten millions of Anglo-Saxons!

THE CLAIMS OF NATURAL AND REVEALED RELIGION.

The following thoughts were suggested by a perusal of a recent publication by Mr. A. B. Bradford, The Absolute Sufficiency of Natural Religion as a Revelation from God, Examined in the Light of Reason and the Bible: Salem, O., 1874.

The essay is a frank, sincere statement of Mr. Bradford, formerly a Presbyterian minister, who in the preface says: "I am fully aware that many of my old personal friends, who are still in the land of Egypt, and in the house of bondage, will be pained at the position I take in regard to the Church. But I cannot help it. I must be faithful to my convictions, however much of reputation it may cost me. If they will read and study only half as much as I did before I became enlightened and freed from my bondage, they will be convinced that I am right; for not one of them is half so blind and bigoted a Presbyterian as I was."

This essay reminds us in some respects of David Friedrich Strauss's last work, The Old Faith and the New, but there is this difference: Mr. Bradford still discusses the old question: Can a rational man, a human being endowed with reason, intellect, still be an Orthodox Christian? Strauss answers this question in the negative, like Mr. Bradford, but he goes a step further. He is bold enough to prolong this interesting discussion, and, on the basis of recent developments in scientific speculations, by the guide of Darwin, Haeckel, and other evolutionists, he is compelled to admit even that the "old faith" in a personal Creator, an anthropomorphic God, belongs to the relics of a superstitious age.

Mr. Bradford says, page 6: "If their natural feelings are cultivated by knowledge, and have free play, they clothe him (the Supreme Being) with adorable attributes." Here, then, it appears that the conclusions of advanced thought and those of "Natural Religion," as interpreted by Mr. Bradford, differ. As Prof. Tyndall remarked in his recent Inaugural Address, the domain of religion, natural as well as revealed, exists only in the emotional, transcendental element of our nature, and has nothing at all to do with science. For this reason, the different definitions of the "Christian, extra-Christian, and anti-Christian" position of some of our liberal writers seem to be fruitless problems. If such a thing as a religion in harmony with, or rather the result of, scientific facts and demonstrations, were possible, the best name for this "Scientific Religion" would be that proposed by Prof. Haeckel; namely, "Monism." Mr. Bradford says further: "He (man) longs for immortality, and accepts with rapture any evidence that departed friends still live in a disembodied state." This may apply to Christians, to Spiritualists; but it is far from being a general fact. As a brilliant writer in that brilliant publication, the Modern Thinker (No. 2, page 83), says, in an article on "Creation, God, Soul, Hereafter": "These questions are not innate in the mind. On the contrary, they are artificial, and result from peculiar habits of mind; and, in fact, they cannot be traced in some of the most remarkable groups and races of mankind. . . . These particular questions do not differ in kind from many theologico-metaphysical questions which have been often agitated."

The "pure Buddhist," according to this Modern Thinker, and according to all the information we have, one of the noblest of all the religious natures, not only did not dread the extinction of his personality, but he thirsted after it and prayed for it with ecstasy. Annihilation is his heaven; God, as the creator and sustainer of things, is his fiend and adversary. His sphinx puts a very different problem from that of Christian philosophers—not, How was it all made? but, How shall it all end? He, in his pilgrim's progress, borne down by his burden, might be heard crying out, in tones as pathetic as Christian's: "Who shall deliver me from the wrath that is? How can I enter into the world that is not?"

This is Sakya-Muni's idea of Nirvana. Holyoake did not fear death, and had no hope whatever concerning a hereafter. Büchner, the author of that immensely popular book on Matter and Force, an outspoken Materialist, confesses that the thought of the possibility of a future state of existence would be unendurable, horrible to him.

On page 11 our author gives us his definition of "what Natural Religion is" in the following words:—

"The Religion of Nature, revealed to the reason of man, consists in the recognition of a Supreme Being who embodies in his character the perfection of wisdom, power, justice, and goodness."

Now these are human attributes of the Deity; this is pure theism. Mr. Bradford asserts: "The planetary systems, all in motion, display his power. The wondrous arrangements adapting means to ends exhibit his wisdom." Mr. Bradford assumes, therefore, that this Supreme Being is the creator of the universe, or, to use his words, the planetary systems. Before the creation of the world, this God could not, then, have been in the possession of this "power" in its most perfect state; for, if he had been, there would have been no cause for the production of so many useless things, by which he, incapable of reaching a higher state of perfection, only became less powerful. That deep thinker, E. von Hartmann, in his Philosophy of the Unconscious, arrives at this conclusion: If God, before the creation, had been conscious of what he was going to do, the creation could only be considered as an inexcusable crime; it was only pardonable as the result of a blind will.

It is rather singular how tenacious of life this anthropomorphic God is! German philosophy has annihilated him, and modern science only confirms over and over again that, if there is anything proven at all, it is this — that everything in Nature is perfectly natural, and not as the metaphysicians and theologians attempt to make people believe, unnatural; that this cosmos, universe, or these "planetary systems all in motion," instead of displaying anybody's power, only display the eternal laws of Nature, and that therefore Voltaire's jeu d'esprit, "Si Dieu n'existait pas, il faudrait l'inventer," can only be taken as a bon-mot of that satirical Frenchman. Says Underwood: "The absurdity of the à posteriori argument for a God consists in the assumption that what we call order, harmony, and adaptation are evidences of design; when it is evident that, whether there be a God or not, order, harmony, and adaptation must have existed from all eternity, and are not, therefore, necessary proof of a designing cause." And again: "As a rigid analysis of our conceptions of God shows that the predicates of God are only our own qualities, so I believe that, reduced to its simplest form, the belief in God is but a belief in our own existence; that we but individually affirm our own existence in affirming God's existence; that anthropology is the true key to theology."

That this applies to Mr. Bradford's "Natural Religion" is evident. "Man uses Nature as a mirror wherein are reflected the properties of his own being." (Humboldt.) "It is reflecting reason which brought design into the world, and which admires a wonder created by itself." (Kant.)

We have not time now to discuss the other attributes of this God of Natural Religion,—justice, and goodness. But in regard to these qualities, Mr. Charles Bradlaugh's words would apply to him with as much force as to the God of Orthodoxy. Bradlaugh says: "They say I blaspheme. How can I? For me, blasphemy is impossible. It implies belief: whereas I am an atheist. It is you who blaspheme, if you believe in a God and yet attribute to him any action that would dishonor a man."

This pamphlet of Mr. Bradford will accomplish a great deal of good, however. It is the author's sincerity, honesty, calm reasoning, which will attract readers who would be repelled by the perusal of some of our recent radical literature. It is a brave, a noble essay; it shows moral courage and deep study, qualities which we do not meet with every day. We invite every radical thinker to read it, and extend to Mr. Bradford our heartfelt congratulations for leaving the ranks of fanatical priesthood. We conclude with Swinburne's beautiful sentences from his "Hymn to Man":

"Thou and I and he are not gods, made men for a span,
But God, if a God there be, is the substance of men, which is man.
Our lives are as pulses or pores of his manifold body and breath;
As waves of his sea on the shores, where birth is the beacon of death.
We men, the multiform features of man, whatsoever we be,
Recreate him of whom we are creatures, and all we only are he.
Not each man of all is God, but God is the fruit of the whole;
Indivisible spirit and blood, indiscernible body from soul."

BAPTIST PREACHERS' MEETING.

A COUNTER-STATEMENT.

The regular weekly meeting of the Baptist preachers of Boston and vicinity was held in the vestry of Tremont Temple at 10 o'clock this morning. Dr. Lorimer was in the chair, and, after devotions and routine business, introduced Rev. Joseph Williams, who briefly addressed the Conference upon the subject of the "Lost Tribes of Israel."

Rev. W. V. Garner, pastor of the Charles Street Church, in behalf of the committee appointed at a previous meeting to investigate and report upon the case of Edward F. Strickland, then submitted the following statement:—

The committee to whom was referred the case of Edward F. Strickland, who intruded upon this meeting with a written statement concerning his alleged "change of belief," etc., which he was tolerated in reading, on Monday morning, September 21, would report:—

That, according to documents in their possession, it appears that he has had no recognizable standing among Baptists for several years, having left the denomination previous to 1870, and having become connected with the Congregationalists in Michigan, where he was virtually suspended from the ministry among them, by a vote of the Kalamazoo Association, February 24, 1870. The following is a certified extract from the report upon which the action was taken:

"That he is a man of such a cast, and of such a practical life, that we could not feel safe in recommending him to our churches; nor could we conscientiously recommend him to the patronage of the American Home Missionary Society; nor could we give him clean papers in case of his desire to leave our body.

"That, finally, inasmuch as there is so much that looks badly in his ministerial course, we recommend that this Association advise him to demit the ministry as a calling, in which he seems to have been so unfortunate and unsuccessful, and for which he seems not adapted."

Within six or seven months from the above date of his virtual suspension, he appeared in Maine, and commenced preaching for a Baptist church in that State, in October, 1870, taking with him, as we are informed by letters in our hands, "a letter dated Dayton, Ohio, 1860, and indorsed in 1864, which he held in his own hands and read in church meeting, stating that it was his general course to keep the letter to himself, and he did keep it." This old letter, given years before his going over to the Congregationalists to be set aside by them, was, as we learn, used by him to get a membership in a Baptist church, which was irregularly transferred, soon after, to the church in Rhode Island, from which he claims in his statement read before us that he received a "letter of commendation and dismissal." A standing thus secured can only be regarded as fraudulent, and, with such antecedents, it could be nothing short of audacity on his part to come before the meeting and assume to withdraw from a body to which he did not right fully belong, either ministerially or denominationally.

We might add that his whole course for more than a year past in the place where he has held Sabbath services of an extraordinary character has not by any means entitled him to recognition as a Baptist minister holding the "fundamental doctrines" of Baptist churches, and no one at all familiar with his strange sayings and doings could possibly think of him in that character. We believe that, while he has to the very last been more than ready to occupy profitable positions among us, he has not for a long time been even slightly in sympathy with us doctrinally or ecclesiastically, and that he cannot in any sense be said to have gone out from us, for he manifestly was not of us.

The report was accepted as read, and Rev. Mr. Garner offered the following, which was also adopted:—

Resolved, That we deem it unfortunate that, as a Baptist Ministers' Conference, we have no article in our constitution strictly defining the conditions of membership in this body, and that, in consequence, parties having no regular connection with our body can foist themselves upon us, and, if so disposed, can use us as the means of their elevation in public estimation, however unworthy they may be; we, therefore, recommend that a committee be appointed to examine and revise the existing constitution so far as to make the terms of membership definite.

"THE DENOUNCED BAPTIST MINISTER."

In the Report of the Committee of Baptist Ministers at Tremont Temple, relative to my renunciation of their creed, statements were made which are grossly untruthful in every important particular; and I solicit the privilege of submitting documentary evidence of their falsity.

It is represented by the Committee's Report that I have had no "recognizable standing among the Baptists, having left the denomination previous to 1870;" and that I connected myself with the Congregationalists in Michigan, who virtually suspended me from their ministry.

In reply to this scandalous statement, I affirm that, while I considered it my right and privilege to preach the Gospel in any church willing to receive the truth as I then understood it, I never identified myself with or became a member of a Congregational church, except as a "stated supply;" that no ecclesiastical council was ever summoned by any church, and therefore I could not be legally deposed or suspended from the ministry. This the following church letter, bearing date February 28, 1869, sufficiently demonstrates:—

"At a special call meeting of the First Congregational Church of Dowagiac, Michigan, the following motion was made and unanimously adopted, and ordered to be entered upon the church record:—

"Resolved, That the Rev. Edward F. Strickland having tendered his resignation and informed us that he has accepted another field of labor, we feel it our privilege and duty to cordially and affectionately commend him as an earnest and energetic minister of our Lord Jesus Christ; also to state that during two years and six months he has labored with us faithfully and acceptably, and that he and his family carry with them our Christian love and earnest prayers for their continued usefulness in that part of our Lord's vineyard whereunto they are sent.

"Done by order of the church, this 28th day of February, 1869.

"Cyrus Tuthill, Church Clerk."

The Congregational ministers of Michigan, disapproving of my position as a Baptist minister in their ranks, without authority of any church, and disregarding the strong protest of the Dowagiac church, passed a set of resolutions advising me to "demit my ministry," etc.

I submit here a copy of this protest, as an overwhelming refutation of the charges made against me by the Kalamazoo Association:—

"Dowagiac, Mich., Sept 8, 1869.

"To the Business Committee, Kalamazoo Ministerial Association:—

"We, the officers of the Congregational Church of Dowagiac, having received information that a Committee has been appointed by your association to investigate charges made against our late pastor, the Rev. E. F. Strickland, and that, in your Committee's Report, said Committee state Mr. Strickland had produced weakness, division, and distraction in our midst; and that, during the deliberations of said Committee, it had disregarded a letter of dismission and commendation granted by this church to Rev. E. F. Strickland on his resignation as Acting Pastor of this church; and that said letter of dismissal and commendation was granted by a unanimous rising vote of our church and congregation (the said Committee of the Kalamazoo Congregational Association imputing partiality of the church and undue influence exercised by Mr. Strickland to obtain said letter from us), we have thought it our duty to deny emphatically the statement made by the Committee's Report in all its premises in reference to the result of the labors of the Rev. E. F. Strickland with us. Also we, the Dowagiac Congregational Church, beg to apprise the Kalamazoo Association Business Committee, that the letter of dismission and commendation rejected by them is a genuine document, and as such, by order of the church, is entered upon our Record.

"J. J. Stebbins, }

"Cyrus Tuthill, Church Clerk."

Receiving an invitation to the pastorate of the Baptist Church of Camden, Maine, I related before that church my views as to my right of occupying any church pulpit, and that, though I had occupied a Pædo-Baptist pulpit, I had never joined the church as a member of that body. I presented a letter of commendation from the Wayne Street Baptist Church of Dayton, Ohio, and, by a unanimous vote of the Camden Church, was received into their fellowship and pastorate.

The statement made by the Boston ministers' Report that "it is nothing short of audacity" on my part to come before their meeting and withdraw from a body to which I did not rightfully belong, either ministerially or otherwise, is false in every particular.

At the expiration of my pastorate of the Chestnut Street Baptist Church, at Camden, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted by that body:—

"Resolved, Unanimously, by the Chestnut Street Baptist Church of Camden, Me., that we profoundly regret the resignation of our beloved pastor, the Rev. Edward F. Strickland, and that we regard our pastor as a Baptist clergyman sound in the doctrines of the Gospel, and able in their promulgation.

"Resolved, That the affability and Christian walk before the world and the church, and the kindness and faithfulness, of our pastor, have endeared him to us, and that we accept his resignation with heartfelt regret. F. Mills, Church Clerk."

Immediately on my resignation of the above church, I received and accepted a call to the Calvary Baptist Church, of Westerly, R. I., to become their pastor; and on my resignation one year afterward I received the following letter of dismissal and commendation:—

"Calvary Baptist Church, Westerly, R. I., to the Second Baptist Church, Chelsea, Mass.:

"Dear Brethren,—This is to certify that Rev. E. F. Strickland, and Sisters Fanny D. Strickland and Katie D. Strickland, are members with us in good standing, and at their request are granted letters for the purpose of uniting with you. If received by you within six months, we shall regard them dismissed from us. And may the blessing of the great Head of the Church abide with you and the brother and sisters who leave us.

"By order of the church,

"G. G. Stillman, Clerk.

"Westerly, R. I., May 7, 1873."

On the 15th of May, 1873, I received an invitation to supply the First Baptist Church of Stoughton, Mass. The church, becoming disaffected with my views of the doctrine of Total Depravity, etc., ordered me to withdraw: the people of Stoughton called a mass meeting of the whole town, resolved themselves into a religious society, by the title of the Union Christian Association of East Stoughton, and invited me to become their pastor; the call was accepted: and in this capacity I still continue.

The public will thus perceive that the sole cause of the attack made upon me by the Tremont Temple Baptist clergy is occasioned by my assuming the right to preach to any people willing to receive me, irrespective of all denominational bias or rule. This "unministerial" course of mine would have passed unnoticed: even the denunciation of the Congregational clergy would never have seen the light. But when I dared to go openly before the Baptist clergy of Tremont Temple and publish to the world my abjuration of Baptist doctrine, then the heavy guns of Baptist wrath are opened upon me, and I am denounced as an audacious imposter who had "gone out from us, but was not of us." The question of bitterness, acrimony, lack of Christian charity, and, more than all, of truth, I am not afraid to leave to the judgment of an unprejudiced and impartial public.

As soon as arrangements can be effected, services will be held in a hall in Boston, where my experience in and conversion from the theatrical profession, and my experience of the Evangelical ministry, will be freely narrated. Due notice to the public will be given. Edw. F. Strickland, Late Baptist Minister.

The terrible sufferings to which the agricultural laborers are exposed have been most keenly illustrated by a case reported from North Hampshire. We read that Mary Day, wife of a laborer at Lasham, near Alton, though sixty-seven years of age, had (it transpired at an inquest), for the last five years, for want of sufficient habitable accommodation in the parish, been compelled to live with her husband entirely in sheltered spots about the farm on which the husband worked. Latterly they had erected a hut, consisting of a few hurdles covered with straw, in a chalk-pit on the farm. The woman was taken ill, and her husband applied for an order on the parish medical officers, which was refused; but Dr. Leslie, hearing of the case, sent her a cough mixture. Subsequently her husband, on returning from work, found her shivering and suffering from severe sickness. His master sent her a little brandy, and went to see her; but she died in his presence. When the coroner and jury went to see the body, they found it lying where it had remained since death, exposed, and unattended night and day by any save the husband; and the only arrangement made by the authorities for the funeral was to have a coffin placed by the side of the body. Words, as the Examiner truly remarks, fail in a case like this. A fugitive murderer, a thieving tramp, a leper, a mange-stricken dog, might meet with such treatment; but this woman's husband is a man who works for his "living"—he is "a laborer in Christian England." Is it against a class of which this miserable couple are a possible outcome that English farmers, English lords and gentlemen, are prepared to fight to the bitter end?—London National Reformer.

"Little Tommy did not disobey mamma and go in swimming, did he?" "No, mamma; Jimmy Brown and the rest of the boys went in, but I remembered and would not disobey you." "And Tommy never tells lies, does he?" "No, mamma; I couldn't go to heaven." "Then how does Tommy happen to have on Jimmy Brown's shirt?"

The Humbug of Early Rising.—All this talk about early rising is moonshine. The habit of turning out of bed in the middle of the night suits some people; let them enjoy it. But it is folly to lay down a general rule upon the subject. Some men are fit for nothing all day after they have risen early in the morning. Their energies are deadened, their imaginations are heavy, their spirits are depressed. It is said you can work so well in the morning. Some people can, but others can work best at night; others, again, in the afternoon. Long trial and experiment form the only conclusive tests upon these points. As for getting up early because Prof. Gammon has written letters to the papers proving the necessity of it,—let no one be goose enough to do it. We all know the model man, aged eighty: "I invariably rise at five; I work three hours, take a light breakfast—namely, a cracker and a pinch of salt,—work five hours more, never smoke, never drink anything but barley-water, eat no dinner, and go to bed at six in the evening." If anybody finds that that donkeyfied sort of life suits him, by all means let him continue it. But few people would care to live to eighty on those terms. If a man cannot get all withered and crumpled up on easier conditions than those, it is almost as well that he should depart before he is a nuisance to himself and a bore to everybody else. School-boys, and young people generally, ought to get up early, for it is found that nine-tenths of them can stand it; and it does them good. But let no one torture himself with the thought that he could have been twice as good a man as he is if he had risen every morning at daylight. The habit would kill half of us in five years.—New York Times.

SORROW.

Amid the wastes of desert sands
The purest spring may oft be flowing;
Amid the wilds of savage lands
The loveliest flowers may be growing,
Though often viewed with careless eye,
Or scornfully passed heedless by.

Yet both appeal to human hearts,
Both loving lessons e'er are telling;
The fragrance which the rose imparts,
The ripples from the spring upwelling,
Speak gently of the tender rest
That all may find on Nature's breast.

The heart attuned to Nature's wiles,
Meeting her strokes with trust abiding,
Will find she wears her sweetest smiles
For those whose hearts are most confiding,
And chastens mortals to reprove
Their blindness to their Mother's love.

Would we could heed the priceless worth
That lies in discipline of sorrow,
To give the soul, while yet of earth,
A foretaste of the bright to-morrow!
For souls by sorrow purified
But lose the dross of selfish pride.

The heart that hath deep sorrow known
Hath been by secret forces moulded,
That, from the bonds of self outgrown,
The God-in-us may be unfolded,
When soul to soul through Nature round
Will pulsate to the finest sound.

When hearts with softer feelings glow,
Souls will see more of Nature's beauty,
And hear her accents whispering low—
That sorrow is the path to duty,
And all that hear her sweet-toned voice
Have learned in sorrow to rejoice.

And learn that life through Nature runs,
That life, through lines of finest tracing,
Links man to stars and distant suns,
With loving glow all things embracing:
Then Nature's secret lies revealed,
No more by selfishness concealed.

CAUTION.

F. A. Porter, formerly of Alton, Illinois, was appointed an agent for the Index Association last July, and authorized to receive subscriptions for The Index. Receipts signed by him have been forwarded to this office by parties whose names he has never reported, and whose money he has kept. He was written to several weeks ago, demanding an explanation of his course, but has failed to reply; and now, in protection of the public and the Association, it is necessary to publish these facts, to cancel his appointment as agent, and caution all parties against paying any money to him on account of The Index. The paper will be sent in good faith to all persons who forward to us receipts, signed by F. A. Porter before this date, in accordance with their terms; but the public are hereby notified that his receipts of a later date will not be acknowledged at this office.

F. E. Abbot,
For Index Association.

Boston, Oct. 22, 1874.

The Index will be sent to any name not now on our mail-list until January 1, 1876, on receipt of $3.00 in advance. Here is a chance to receive the paper for fifteen months at the price of twelve months. Please tell your friends and neighbors of this liberal offer, and help us to increase our circulation.

The New York Weekly Tribune of October 7 had a letter from Mr. Thomas W. Conway, late Superintendent of Education in Louisiana, on "Mixed Schools at the South," which we should have been glad to print in this number of The Index, as an important testimony to the practical wisdom, as well as inherent justice, of the Civil Rights Bill. Press of other matter, however, obliges us to defer it till next week.

If any one of our readers desires to send The Index to an Evangelical clergyman who will consent to receive it, it shall be mailed to such clergyman for a year on receipt of his address in full and two dollars; and this reduced subscription may be paid by anybody. Here is a chance to convert the reverend clergy! We should like nothing better than to put a copy of this paper every week into the hands of the forty-three thousand ministers of this great Yankee nation.

James C. Parsons, in the Unitarian Review for September, says that "Mr. Abbot deduces not only thought, but the thinking power, from the operations of matter." The only ground of this absurd assertion is our statement that "the faculty of moral intuition itself is the result of the perpetual action on man of his moral environment and his reaction to it." Is Mr. Parsons unable to discriminate between "matter" and "moral environment"? If he is, we are not. One might as well identify the Copernican system with the Union Pacific Railroad.

HOW THEY PERSECUTE NOWADAYS.

The following editorial paragraph in reference to Rev. Edward F. Strickland, whose card announcing a "change of belief" was published in The Index of October 1, appeared in the New York Independent of October 15:—

"That Mr. Strickland who withdrew in such a formal manner from the Baptist Pastors' Conference of Boston, on account of the change of his views concerning total depravity and certain other doctrines, seems to have stood upon the order of his going much more than was meet. The Conference has printed a statement to the effect that he never rightfully belonged to it; that what standing he had in the Baptist denomination was fraudulently obtained; and that, under the circumstances, his 'withdrawal' is 'nothing short of audacity.' If we may believe the story of these indignant brethren, Mr. Strickland not only believes in total depravity, but lives up to it pretty well."

This paragraph alludes to the "counter-statement" which was adopted by the "Baptist Preachers' meeting of Boston and vicinity" on October 5, and published immediately in four of the chief dailies of this city. In another column we republish this document entire. It makes several serious charges:—

1. That Mr. Strickland has had "no recognizable standing among Baptists," having "left the denomination previous to 1870."

2. That he subsequently became "connected with the Congregationalists in Michigan."

3. That he was "virtually suspended from the ministry" by the Kalamazoo Association [Congregationalist] in February, 1870; by resolutions which (in our opinion) contain an artful insinuation of immorality, without directly charging him with it—resolutions which would naturally suggest immorality to most people, but would be as easily explained by doctrinal heresy, or ecclesiastical displeasure on other than moral grounds.

4. That, "within six or seven months from the above date," he obtained a membership in a Baptist church in Maine by using an old letter from Dayton, Ohio, which he had no right to use because he had subsequently "gone over to the Congregationalists to be set aside by them."

5. That this membership, thus obtained, was soon after "irregularly transferred" to the Baptist church in Westerly, Rhode Island.

6. That "a standing thus secured can only be regarded as fraudulent," and that it was "audacity" to withdraw from a ministerial body to which he had never rightfully belonged.

These are charges of the utmost gravity, if true, and would put Mr. Strickland in the position of an impudent impostor before the public. We do not wonder that he now, having tried in vain to get justice done him by the dailies which published the attack upon him, asks us to print the accusation and his defence together. This we cheerfully do in the interest of fair play, and we call attention to the leading points which he makes in reply to the above specific charges:—

1. That he has never left the Baptist denomination until now, though he has preached as "stated supply" in other pulpits; as is very often done.

2. That he never became connected with the Congregationalists in any other way, whether as pastor or church-member.

3. That the Kalamazoo Congregationalist Association had no authoriiy to pass their resolutions, which were vigorously protested against by his own church at the time.

4. That, having never left the Baptists or forfeited his membership in their denomination, he had a perfect right to use the old Dayton letter of recommendation at Camden.

5. That the Camden church recommended him as a "Baptist clergyman sound in the doctrines," etc., and therefore that he went to Westerly without any "irregularity."

6. That the charge of "fraud" is wholly false, and does him gross injustice.

Now we never saw Mr. Strickland until after the publication of his card, and cannot of course give personal testimony to his character; but his documents, if genuine, disprove the charges made against him, and he appeals to the official records in proof of their genuineness. If the Independent is not disposed to connive with a pack of self-convicted persecutors and slanderers, it will promptly correct the injustice of its paragraph by stating the truth about Mr. Strickland. But, though the Independent should stick to its copied misrepresentations, for which it was not to blame originally, free-thinkers will find no difficulty in detecting the real animus of the Tremont Temple manifesto. The pulpit and the press are quick enough to combine in hounding down every man who sets himself in open opposition to the accepted religion of the day; and they are powerful enough to inflict great wrong and suffering upon their victims. All the more reason why liberals should resist this oppression and defend the oppressed. Nothing is clearer than that only sectarian malice will "believe the story of these indignant brethren."

THE TWO SPIRITS.

On the Sunday immediately following the late insurrection against the State government of Louisiana, Rev. Dr. Markham preached in the pulpit of the Lafayette Presbyterian Church, at New Orleans, a sermon lauding the outbreak in exaggerated terms. A local daily well reports it as "Treason in the Pulpit." We are informed by one of our New Orleans correspondents that such was and is the voice of the pulpit all over the State.

Another correspondent from the same city (an ex-officer of the Federal army) says:—

"I agree perfectly with Mr. Hallowell in his article on 'The Civil Rights Bill and the Nation,' in The Index of September 24, that 'the present defiant and aggressive attitude' of the South 'is to be referred to the encouragement it found in the failure of Congress to pass a bill that would protect the negro.' The hostility here is not really against Kellogg, but against the principles of his party—against the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. The growlers use the alleged illegality of Kellogg's government as a cat's-paw. They well know that, if the votes showed McEnery elected, the votes were fraudulent, as Carpenter admitted when he tried to defend McEnery in the Senate. Furthermore, these Southerners well know that the registration offices were in many instances concealed from the negro in the parishes in the interior of the State. The offices were changed about, and such obstacles were thrown in the way of the colored men that a count showed not less than twenty thousand who were thus prevented from voting. Had the McEnery party kept control of the State, no Yankee would have cared to live here. Even now it is disagreeable enough. The words 'damned Yankee' are constantly hissed at Northern men. But a short time ago a most brutal attack was made upon myself by one of these high-toned gentlemen, simply because I demanded that the negro should have a fair chance, and used expressions commending General Grant and the government. The party making the attack (physical violence, striking right out for your eyes, and even trying to get hands on your throat) well knew that I was crippled by my wounds in the army, and had but one good arm. With great difficulty I protected myself from injury until others interposed. In simple justice to ex-Confederate soldiers, I will say that this man was not one of them. He fled to Mexico during the war, and returned to fight cripples at the end of the war.

"There is as much rebellion to-day in Louisiana as there was thirteen years ago. Such papers as the New York Tribune encourage the slaveholding spirit of the South. Had James Buchanan been President two weeks ago [this letter is dated September 29], where would the South have been to-day?

"The hatred for the negro in any other capacity than that of a menial servant or slave is still the prevailing feeling South. It seems to be in their blood. Greeley's expression, 'the tiger's milk of slavery,' I now understand as I never did before. I came here quite conservative and generous in my feeling for the South, as most Northern officers did. I even voted for McClellan in my enthusiasm for the man, for I was a 'Potomac Army boy.' But a Northern man becomes a radical rapidly down here. There will be no peace here while the old spirit of slavery survives. The leopard can as soon change his spots as the Southern man his feeling towards the negro. He will finally sell his plantation; the Northerner and German will buy it, and cut it up into farms of reasonable size."

This long extract need not be apologized for, for it embodies testimony very valuable and evidently very sincere. It is for the Southern spirit thus depicted that Rev. Dr. Markham spoke; and it is right that the North should understand that the Church is just as eager to defend the slavery-spirit to-day as it was to defend the slavery-institution a few years ago. It is the spirit of true radicalism alone that can venerate the equal rights of all mankind; and that is the spirit of Anti-Christianity.

"NEWSPAPER ETHICS."

In a long article under the above caption, the Nation calls upon every reader of a newspaper who detects in it the want of "pecuniary integrity," "to do his part in making it disgraceful and unprofitable." This demand from such a source is peculiarly suggestive. That the Nation is venal, that its editorial columns have ever been or are now in the market, as it alleges of the Independent, we have no reason to believe; but "pecuniary integrity" in journalism involves something more than absence of venality. For example, Mr. Abbot, by profession of zeal in the cause of Free Religion, induced a part of the public to contribute money for the establishment and support of THE INDEX. If, after becoming firmly seated in the editorial chair, Mr. Abbot had diverted this paper from its original objects, and was now advocating the proposed Christian Amendment to the Constitution, he would be justly chargeable with a lack of pecuniary integrity, and the supporters of THE INDEX could not be too severe in their reprobation of him. Pecuniary integrity on the part of a journal whose capital has been supplied by others implies fulfilment of all moral obligations to the contributors, assumed by the editor when he accepted his position. Are the hands of the Nation clean? Is this attack upon a rival journal prompted by a creditable desire to raise the moral standard of journalism, or is it another miserable instance of the pot calling the kettle black?

The editor of the Nation may have found it convenient to forget, but some of us have thought it worth while to remember, that of the one hundred thousand dollars subscribed toward the establishment of his paper, a large part was paid for the purpose of enabling him to redeem his promises to the freedmen.

Sixteen thousand dollars were paid from the surplus of funds belonging to the Boston Committee for Recruiting Colored Troops; thirteen thousand dollars were paid by the late Major George L. Stearns, and smaller sums by other friends of the freedmen. What the promises were upon which this money was obtained, the prospectus of the Nation plainly indicates. It states one of the "main objects" of the paper to be—

"The earnest and persistent consideration of the condition of the laboring class at the South, as a matter of vital interest to the nation at large, with a view to the removal of all artificial distinctions between them and the rest of the population, and the securing to them, as far as education and justice can do it, of an equal chance in the race of life."

These promises are followed by others similar in character; and, as if to strengthen the belief of the public that they would be carried out in good faith, the name of William Lloyd Garrison is mentioned on the list of writers secured for the paper.

What was expected of the Nation by its friends and projectors, the following extract from an editorial by Mr. Garrison in the Liberator, June 30, 1865, will show:—

"As the Liberator is to terminate its publication at the close of its present volume, we are glad to be able to commend to its friends and patrons the new weekly periodical, . . . the Nation, believing as we do that it will be eminently deserving of the most liberal patronage, not only for its superior literary and scientific merits, but for . . . . its soundly reformatory spirit and its thorough advocacy of the rights of the freedmen at the South. The stockholders . . . . have subscribed to this enterprise . . . . for the purpose of establishing a first-class journal in the interest of humanity, progress, the common weal. . . . The friends of freedom and equal rights should take an interest in its widest circulation."

This evidence as to the promises of the Nation, especially in its relation to the freedmen, on the one side, and the expectations of its projectors on the other, we claim is conclusive.

The Nation was launched, and its projectors were jubilant. Mr. Charles E. Norton, who claims to be "personally cognizant of all the more important circumstances attending the establishment of the Nation," after a few numbers of the paper had been issued, noticed with pleasure that it was abused by the Copperheads, and that Mr. Wendell Phillips was supposed by a Southern editor to be its inspiring genius.

Here, indeed, was just cause for congratulation by all "friends of freedom and equal rights;" but has the Nation continued to fulfil its promises? Would Mr. Garrison to-day recommend "its soundly reformatory spirit," and endorse it as the legitimate successor of his Liberator? Would any Southern editor suspect Wendell Phillips to be its inspiring genius? And to these questions let us add one more equally pertinent.

Has the money subscribed in the interest of the "laboring class of the South" been honestly devoted to this end? If it had been, the Nation might with some small degree of propriety assume the moral rôle, and preach homilies on pecuniary integrity to its less virtuous neighbors. But we doubt whether the history of journalism affords a more striking illustration of bad faith toward pecuniary contributors than is to be found in the record of the Nation. The class of persons recognized the world over as friends of the negro has been the special object of its ridicule and contempt. The reactionary tone of the paper upon the question of "vital interest to the nation at large" is known to every one who reads it. It is doing what it can to-day to perpetuate "artificial distinctions" in Southern society, and to reconstruct the South, not upon a basis of equality, but upon class and caste. The White Leagues find in it a ready and reckless apologist for their crimes against the negro, and their usurpation of State governments.

But to realize the extent of the Nation's violation of promises to its projectors, and the depth of its apostasy to the freedmen, one must compare the prospectus we have referred to, and the utterances of the paper during the first year of its publication, with its editorial columns of the last few weeks. On July 27, 1865, it could say: "We should make root and branch work with the prejudices that flowed from slavery. . . . We ask him [President Johnson] to take care that the new society at the South shall not be reorganized in such fashion that a man may be excluded from civil rights for the ridiculous reason that his skin is of a particular hue." Contrast these demands with the scandalous editorial of September 17, 1874, in which Mr. Sumner's Civil Rights Bill is denounced as "violent and lawless," "equally" so with "acts of violence and lawlessness" of the negroes' "old masters."

Again, July 27, 1865, the Nation said: "Class government at the South is the form of all others most hostile to real liberty and real progress, most subversive of human rights, and most productive of agitation, violence, and internal dissension." Compare this declaration with the editorial from which we have just quoted, and in which the advocates of the Civil Rights Bill, in the Senate, are held responsible for the present "agitation, violence, and internal dissension" in the South. In the first number of the Nation, issued July 6, 1865, the editor said: "To suppose that he [the negro] will receive fair play from white legislators who are not responsible to him, who have no sympathy with him, and who, in their secret hearts, consider him a beast of the field, is to violate every rule of democratic government, and to make an open and shameless declaration of want of faith in our own principles." Compare this protest against White rule in the South with the editorial of October 8, 1874, in which, with a ponderous array of figures, inconsequent conclusions, and sleepy logic, the editor pretends to furnish a "complete answer to those who say the negroes cannot trust the whites to govern them," and gravely informs the reader that "where they are forced to trust them, all goes well."

Concerning the Nation's quarrel with the Independent we know but little, and care still less; but when it presumes to enforce the value of "pecuniary integrity" in journalism, we perform a simple duty to the press in revealing the worthlessness of its pretensions. And when on one page it prates about "Newspaper Ethics," and on another uses its power and influence to strengthen the hands of enemies to the negro, the cause of public decency and morals is served by recalling its early promises to the freedmen, and exposing the extent of its shameless apostasy.

THE ORIENTALISTS IN CONGRESS.

The second "International Congress of Orientalists" was held in London, in September. It was a most remarkable assemblage, containing not only some of the most distinguished scholars of Western Europe,—as Max Müller, Sir Henry Rawlinson, Dr. Lepsius, Professor Owen, Professor Leon De Rosny, and a host of others equally or nearly as famous,—but also members from Turkey, Egypt, Syria, India, and Japan. They were all scholars, engaged in some department of Oriental study, and came together to compare facts and discuss theories. They are men in the habit mainly of regarding their subjects from a purely scientific point of view, and therefore were not considering what might be the practical consequences of their investigations.

Yet practical consequences most momentous are involved in the labors of this band of scholars, and in the essays which they quietly read to each other in the sessions of their Congress. The London Times, in an article on the Congress, says: "The fact is that the Orientalists—many of them without knowing it—are doing a great political work. Their investigations, however technically scientific they may appear when separately considered, have in the mass a most important bearing upon the relations of the Western to the Eastern world. They explain differences, they bridge over chasms, they establish affiliations previously unguessed at. . . . The history, the literature, the archæology, the jurisprudence, and the philosophy of the Eastern nations have for the scholars of the Continent a speculative attraction; for Englishmen, and even for those who are not scholars, they have a direct practical interest, because the more we know of Eastern methods of thinking and lines of character the less likely shall we be to make mistakes in dealing with our Indian subjects and their neighbors."

Thus the Times speaks of the political results of the work of these Oriental scholars. But the bearings of their work on religion are equally direct, and the consequences even more important. The language above quoted might have been used indeed almost without change, if in the beginning the writer had said religious work instead of "political." These Oriental scholars, by their investigations into the primitive life of the people of Asia, which is the mother of religions, are helping to build up the Science of Religion. They are proving that all religious development is of one order, and that religions that now seem wide apart are connected by the law of evolution as much as are the languages of India and Europe. "They explain differences, they bridge over chasms, they establish affiliations previously unguessed at." And before such work as this, even if the workers intend no such result, it is as impossible for the old theory of a supernatural and exclusive revelation of Deity, in the Hebrew and Christian religions, to stand, as it is for Chinese geographers longer to maintain that their Celestial Empire occupies the larger part of the earth's surface, while Europe and America are pushed into obscure corners upon the map.

The mere coming together, too, in such an assembly, of representatives of different religions, and the social intercourse incidental to it, cannot but have an effect on the members themselves towards modifying their views of each other's faith. The Congress closed with a grand banquet given by the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House, at which different religions and colors and races sat down in cordial good-will together. Besides the European scholars above named, there was the Patriarch of Syria, Prince Charles, Ruler of Roumania, the Syrian Bishop of Jerusalem, Shunker Punderung, Pandit from India, and others with names of very Asiatic look. Yet the spirit of the occasion seems to have been well expressed by the Hindu Pandit in his speech, when he said that "the labors of the Congress tended to demonstrate that they were all brethren, though separated by distance, color, and creed." And it seems impossible that any of the Christian members of the Congress, after conferring with this Indian delegate as an equal scholar, and dining with him as a social equal, should have felt any great zeal to send missionaries to him as a benighted heathen.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—In my last letter I urged with perhaps some warmth the necessity for watching and guarding against the encroachments of Rome. I would follow it up by a few words on the means by which such opposition may be legitimately carried on by liberals without any infringement of the rights of others, or any breach of charity. I do not suppose the Roman Catholics have any reason to fear a repetition of persecution in any form—social or political—in England or in America. The day is at length passed away in which forcible interference with religious convictions is possible; and there are so many lovable and honored persons of the Catholic faith as to render it all but impossible for their religion to expose them to social disabilities. This is all as it should be. Governments have nothing to do with a man's private opinions so long as they do not interfere with the proper discharge of his public and social duties. If at any time, however, Catholics should be induced to use their political power to the detriment of the State, it would of course then be needful to deprive them of that power, in self-defence. But this contingency need not be at present considered. The question is, What can we do, what ought we to do now, to weaken or frustrate the efforts of a church whose principle are discerned to be so deeply prejudicial to humanity?

The only weapon we can lawfully use is that of persuasion—as all of us will admit. We have a perfect right to spend our lives, if we think proper, in arguing Roman Catholics out of their pernicious doctrines.

I do not of course mean to sanction that most insolent of all the forms of fanaticism indulged in by missionaries and proselytizers—nothing so ill-bred would meet my approval, you may be sure. All I mean is that it is only by talking and writing that we can lawfully oppose any theory we deem pernicious.

The next question is, What ought to be the main point of our attack? Shall it be the most occult of the Church's mysteries, or the most palpable of her abuses?

In my opinion, an attack on these would be fruitless, for the greater the mystery the more credit for believing it; and the less natural moral justification there is for any of the Church's prescriptions or proscriptions, the greater necessity for implicit, unquestioning obedience to them.

No; if we would ever do anything effectual in our efforts to cripple Roman Catholic power, we must first remove from the minds and hearts of the people under her rule that personal fear for their own safety which is the sole secret of the Church's influence.

Priests owe their entire success to this element of fear in the hearts of the people; fear—sometimes the natural result of sense of guilt; but in most cases artificially produced by the teachings of the priest himself, who lays down horrible torments to be avoided as the basis of his teaching.

In plain English, if there is no danger in the life to come, there is no necessity for the Church's antidotes and safeguards. If there is also no fear of any danger, the Church's appeal to "come and be saved" is simply ludicrous.

Now I do not deny that many Roman Catholics have better ideas than this; they think they are pleasing God in obeying the Church, and would be noble enough to continue to do so without hope of reward or promise of escape from torment. But the mass of them are not of this type, but are Catholics through mortal fear of hell and damnation. Again and again I say, Remove this fear, and the Church has no function! Make people assured of their perfect safety, whatever they may believe and whether or not they disobey the priest, and the spell of the Church is broken! The whole system is based on this terror, and it seems to me we have nothing to do but to remove the fear, and the Church's grasp over the souls of men and women will be paralyzed in a moment.

We may try in vain to throw discredit on their dogmas and to shatter their idols; the Protestantism of the sixteenth century tried this and signally failed, leaving Christendom with more than half a mind to recant and go back to Rome. But if we can only show the Romanists that they are all perfectly "safe," whether they obey the Church or not, they will then be able to exercise their reason in examining the pretensions and dogmas of their Church—which is now forbidden them not only by the command of the priest, but by their own instincts, which warn them against the peril of inquiry and free thought.

Now it is very clear that a merely negative system of teaching will never remove this fear. Mere denials are not enough to wean souls from their terror. Courage is better taught by example and inspired by heroic conduct. Hence it is necessary for us to have some positive beliefs which can be adopted in the place of those we want to remove; and if we only gain a hearing, we will answer for it that the native candor of the human mind will admit the superiority of our view of the Divine purposes, and gladly rid itself of its former unhappy and oppressive alarms.

Those of us then who do believe in God and in immortality are, I think, bound to show the Romanist that nobler view of God's impartial love to all which eclipses the old ecclesiastical view and commends itself to the understanding, the conscience, and the affections of man. Once get a man to listen to that, and his fetters are broken forever. No priest or church can ever frighten him again.

And they, the priests, know this as well as we do, and therefore forbid their people to listen to a word from any one beyond their pale. Why this scrupulous caution, if not because the syren voice of the freeman has an irresistible fascination? Why hinder the people from hearing, if what is said be weak or false? No; the priests know too well that their safety lies in concealment and disguise; in keeping back the people from the light; in closing their ears to the testimony of those who have gained their liberty. Can any self-condemnation be more eloquent than this?

I am, sir, very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

A SAMPLE OF CATHOLIC "EDUCATION."

EDITOR INDEX:—

The bishop's speech, given at the dedication of a Catholic schoolhouse, in Worcester, Mass., published in THE INDEX a few weeks ago, called to my mind the preface to a reading-book for schools that I had recently met with, and which I thought might prove interesting enough for publication. The book is the Metropolitan Fourth Reader, published by D. and J. Sadlier & Co., 31 Barclay Street, New York, and is in use in the Catholic schools in this city. The following is an extract from the preface:—

"Having had some experience in the education of youth, and having examined most of the readers published, we noticed that, with the single exception of the Christian Brothers' Series, all the others are better adapted for Pagan than Christian schools. They are made expressly for mixed schools, where Protestant and Catholic, Jew and Pagan, may read out of the same book, without discovering that there is such a thing as religion in the world.

"Dr. Brownson, in his Review for July, has so well described what readers should and should not be, that we will [shall] be pardoned for quoting him, as he expressed far more clearly than we can what we would wish to say:—

"'Instructions in natural history or natural science, as chemistry, mineralogy, geology, quadrupeds, birds, fishes, or bugs, may be very interesting; but they form no part of education, and tend far more to materialize the mind than to elevate it to God, and to store it with moral and religious principles, which may one day fructify, and form a character of moral and true religious worth. A book may contain much useful instruction on nouns, adjectives, verbs, adverbs, participles, and other parts of speech, very proper in a grammar-book, but quite out of place in a reading-book; but all these lessons belong to the department of special instruction, and either have no bearing on education proper, or tend to give to education a dry, utilitarian, and materialistic character. . . . The aim of the reading-book is not instruction, save in the single art of reading, but education, the development or cultivation in the mind and in the heart of those great principles which are the basis of all religion.'"

You can judge of the character of a book having such a preface. Of course, it is full of signs and visions, old wives' fables and young maidens' ghost stories, the Adorable Presence and the Immaculate Conception. And that is the kind of education the Catholics offer us in place of our present good system.

"IS THERE A GOD?"

There either is, or there is not, a Supreme Being. Let us first examine the proposition that there is no God: that the universe, this world, and man are to-day the resultants of development through countless ages; that matter is eternal and infinitely extensive, subjected to laws which are an outgrowth of itself; that under one of these laws intelligence is developed, and a moral nature feeling moral responsibilities has sprung into existence. The common remark which we hear from the freethinker of to-day is: "I will have the truth at all hazards. I will not flinch from my investigation of the truth. I am willing to accept the result of my inquiries, whatever it may be, because I know that, if I honestly look for truth, I am on the right track." And such persons evince a strong feeling of duty owed by them to some person or some thing on this point. If you ask them to whom or to what they owe this duty, they may say that their impulse in the direction of the investigation of truth is an outgrowth of the self-evolved laws which govern matter. Let me remind them that the religions of the world in the past and present, and the scepticism of to-day, are equally outgrowths of matter. Each, according to the theory, is only phenomenal, and one is no more entitled to respect than another, because each is a different development of the same matter, matured in one case into Buddhism, in another into Christianity, in another into freethought, in another into the gross forms of sin,—all owning one originating source and simply phenomenal. What matters it what I think or believe? All is phenomenal; and one phenomenon of matter demands as much consideration as another. If you say that mental phenomena are more entitled to respect than physical, I answer that your decision is merely phenomenal. The only standard of anything is what is. The only thing that we can talk about is that into which matter has developed.

I cannot conceive of more distinct fatalism than that to which the acceptance of this theory logically forces me. I discover myself to be simply an atom in an infinite universe of matter, controlled mentally and physically by the laws which have been evolved out of this infinite mass through countless ages of formation. Such being my condition, I conclude that I need not take any trouble to ascertain the truth, but accept things just as I find them, and, in the future, allow myself to be governed by the laws of which I am simply a resultant. In fact, it seems to me that consistent living under this belief would involve obedience to every impulse, whether mental or physical—a yielding of oneself to be affected by all external and internal influences. The law of life would be, "Obey every impulse."

Let us secondly examine the other proposition; namely, that there is a Supreme Being. If he exist, he must be either good, bad, or indifferent. If I become convinced that the universe is ruled by a bad God, or by a God who is careless about the welfare of man, I lose my interest in my future, because, under the guidance of a bad or a careless Deity, I can never know what a day may bring forth.

My object in the foregoing remarks is to show that the acceptance of either of the ideas—First, That there is no God, or, Second, That there is a God who is either bad or indifferent—forces me logically to the conviction that I need not put myself to the trouble of regulating my life.

I have one more proposition; namely, That there is a God, and that he is good. I naturally conclude that a good God would in some way or other let me know what he wants me to do for the regulation of my life.

Has he done this?

SECTARIAN HYMNS IN OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

While so much is said about the reading of the Bible in our public schools, no one to my knowledge has yet called attention to the frequency with which the teachers and scholars sing the most sectarian hymns; for instance, "Rock of Ages" and "Coronation." The latter I recently heard sung in a teachers' institute, where the brightest girls in the county, old enough to have a lively interest in theology, were thus, at the public expense, taught to think themselves—

"Ye chosen seed of Israel's race, Ye ransomed from the fall."

I have known it to be customary for a high school to conclude its sessions with singing—

"Praise Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

The hymns most in use, however, are taken from the new Sunday-school books, where the most spirited and lively tunes are monopolized by the idea that our sole duty is to worship Jesus and get away from this earth into heaven.

So far as I know, these Orthodox hymns are in use all over the West, even where the teachers are liberal.

There may be some excuse for denying that the Orthodox version of the Bible is a sectarian book, but there is no possibility of questioning the sectarianism of these hymns. There is only too much reason to believe that the Bible, as read in our public schools, has very little influence of any kind over the scholars; but the hymns present the Orthodox dogmas in the most impressive form. We all remember how much the hymns of our childhood moulded our early faith. The progress of the German Reformation was largely due to Luther's hymns, the sudden chanting of one of which in a Roman Catholic church during the celebration of the mass often called forth an outburst of fanaticism which swept away priests, images, and mass-books, and made the whole city Lutheran thenceforth. Such hymns have not wholly lost their power, especially over the young and inquiring, whom we liberals thus quietly permit to be taught Orthodoxy with all the aid of united voices and instrumental music. More than that, we contentedly pay our share of the cost. Even those of us who become teachers find the use of these hymns so easy and general, and the difficulty of introducing any others so great, that we are mostly forced to swim with the stream.

This evil is made a growing one by the increased attention given to music in all the schools.

The worst of it, to me, is the loss of the immense good which might be done, if the time and strength now spent in glorifying Orthodoxy were used in impressing noble moral ideas like those in the familiar hymns, beginning—

"Speak a kind word when you can":

"Dare to do right, dare to be true":

"Honor bright": etc.

There are plenty of such hymns already in print, and the liberals have only to ask that the sectarian ones be excluded, and these moral ones put in their place. How wide a range of subjects might be used with moral and intellectual profit I need not here say, except that almost any good music, not sectarian, might prove of value. The first thing is to get rid of the sectarian hymns, and this seems to me important enough to have a prominent place among the Demands of Liberalism.

TILTON'S LAST WORDS.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I cannot refrain from expressing my opinion in regard to those sentiments uttered by Theodore Tilton in the concluding paragraphs of his last appeal to the public, in which he gives his reasons for pardoning the offence imputed to his wife. No utterance has ever rung through the chambers of the human soul with such grand effect, since the day when Jesus said to the trembling convict, "Neither do I condemn thee! Go, and sin no more." Not for long centuries have such sublime and Christlike words been sounded in the ears of the world by a man in Mr. Tilton's circumstances.

The Pauline idea of marriage, "to avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife, and every woman her own husband," displaced from the Church the contrary teaching of Jesus, who made woman the most important partner in the marital relation; and from that day to this law and custom have regarded the wife as merely a legal prostitute, whose body is owned by her husband for sexual purposes just as any other kind of property is owned. This idea, so degrading to woman, and I may say to man also, is exactly expressed by Petruchio, in his reference to his wife Kate, in "The Taming of the Shrew":—

> "I will be master of what is my own.
> She is my goods, my chattels; she is my house,
> My household-stuff, my field, my barn,
> My horse, my ox, my ass, my any thing;
> And here she stands; touch her whoever dare."

Hence, when McFarland suspected, in the true spirit of our religion and the law, that Richardson was stealing the use of his wife's body, he assassinated him, and a New York jury said, by their verdict of acquittal, that he did right. This Pauline idea of a wife is so ingrained into us as Christians by centuries of legislation that nearly every man, in this country and in England, would feel at liberty to kill both his wife and her seducer in a case of adultery; while no woman would ever dream of requiring her husband to be put to death for the same offence.

But I predict that, when the storm of abuse which has been beating on the head of Theodore Tilton with such fury, especially from the ecclesiastical quarter of the heavens, shall subside,—when the brutal part of the male world shall become tired of crying out "Cuckold!" these golden sentences of Tilton will sink down into the hearts of his countrymen, and eventuate in laws which will bless the whole female sex. I think that every woman in Christendom owes, and should express, her debt of gratitude to him for what he has said on this subject. In the midst of the ruins of his once delightful home,—in the depth of his own personal distress,—and in face of a sneering world,—he has dared to speak a word for woman which only a man noble by nature could, in his circumstances, utter. Whatever offences against morals Mr. Tilton has committed (although in all the proceedings thus far there is no evidence that he has committed any), the world of good men and women can forgive them all in consideration of the course he has pursued towards his wife. And Mrs. Tilton would have acted more worthily as a woman, had she not been victimized by that degrading idolatry of the clergy which characterizes so many of the women of the Christian Church, and which led her to forsake her husband at the very moment when she should have sacrificed her life for him.

In alluding to Paul's definition of marriage, I ought to have said at the right place what I now say in conclusion, that no honorable and enlightened man would ever endorse it, and that Paul spoke these words only in view of the immediate Second Coming of Jesus Christ in the clouds of heaven to inaugurate his Kingdom upon the earth,—an event, as to which he and his fellow apostles, and, if the Evangelists are to be believed, Jesus himself, were all entirely mistaken, since it has not yet taken place. But it is a melancholy fact that words spoken under a hallucination, as we now know it to have been, should be made the basis of a legislation in Church and State whereby, for eighteen hundred years, women have been discriminated against on account of their sex.

FRIENDLY COMMENTS.

Troy, New York, Sept. 30, 1874.

"Don't stop my paper," as one of your correspondents has recently said, from a stand-point of dissent; which dissent, however, is of a very different nature from my own, although your correspondent and I fully agree that "The Index is doing considerably more good than harm, which is about all that can be said of the best things." One of the good points of The Index is that it gives what space it can to the cavils and the criticisms of its readers, and sometimes answers them conclusively. I therefore submit a thought or two which the reading of The Index has occasioned.

I will enter into no etymological discussion as to the origin of the word religion. For one, I shall be glad if it can be ultimately traced to the word religare, to bind back. We bind a flower, a grape-vine, a young fruit-tree, back to its trellis or other support. So the Finite naturally turns to the Infinite, and in it seeks strength, inspiration, and comfort. And having learned, in some small measure, how to understand, love, and obey it, the human soul finds its true destiny and life, forever discerning more and more of the glory of the All-in-All, and, if rightly directed, translating its knowledge into practice.

Thus religion seems to be not emotion merely, nor merely the action of the intellect and the will. It consists in a combination of the three. It implies that intellectual work whereby we ascertain, although to an infinitesimal extent, the nature of that Force (however named) by which the universe is governed, and its laws; and also the cherishing of the emotions of veneration and trust which react upon the moral sense and result in virtue, and tend to produce the higher style of man.

But what shall we say of special religions? What of Christianity? It seems to me that the general consensus of a church furnishes a very strong, although not positively conclusive, presumption in respect to what constitutes the legitimate doctrines of such church. That consensus, and also the Christian records, if fairly read, seem to me to teach the absolute spiritual Lordship of Jesus Christ, his supernatural power and authority, his function as a final judge of the quick and the dead, together with the doctrine of the eternal punishment of the wicked. It is true that in Christianity these doctrines are combined with many admirable spiritual and ethical ideas. Now, then, born as I have been in a Christian land, deeply indebted as I am to many Christian institutions and influences, shall I not, although largely dissenting from the Christian creed, while acknowledging its excellence in some respects, be willing to bear the Christian name? To be honest and true is one of those fundamental laws which all the great special religions fully recognize. Should I be a Darwinian, if I limited my belief in evolution to the case of plants?

Again, if Christianity involves error, am I bound directly to antagonize that error? In all wars, the actual combatants must be few in proportion to the whole mass of the peoples concerned in the result. But how can wars be maintained without incessant industry in the farm and in the workshop beyond the military lines? All have not the soldierly nature, or, if so, a fair opportunity to manifest it.

And again, is the "Free Religionist" to arm himself cap-a-pie, and to fight with equal vigor against James Freeman Clarke and Dr. McCosh? Now "Free Religionists" are commendably tolerant towards each other. We are not shocked because our chief editor declares that the Christian Carthage must be destroyed, nor because Mr. Calthrop persists in navigating his religious Mississippi, nor because Colonel Higginson preserves in his museum the beautiful Cambridge egg from which he has emerged. We disregard differences, when the general drift of thought is in the right direction. Will it not be well to exercise more of this tolerant and fraternal spirit in respect to our Unitarian, Universalist, Hicksite, Broad-Church, and some other brethren, and to co-operate with them when they work well?

TEMPERANCE AGAIN.

Editor of Index:

My dear Sir,—Among the efforts of the friends of temperance to bring all they can under the ægis of some one of their several organizations, the purpose of which is the promotion of their efforts to save as many as possible from the evils of inebriation, whether induced by distilled or fermented liquors, there are many instances of persons being influenced to adopt the pledge before they are fully prepared for it; and without doubt many of these will fall away, and, if they did not take the pledge, they would not stop drinking to intoxication. Again, many who have begun fully to realize that their way was tending to inevitable ruin, and have sought the help of the pledge and the temperance societies to aid them to resist the insidious enemy which, "put into their mouths, would steal away their brains," have found the habit and the appetite too strong to resist, and have lapsed into their old ways; but surely, my dear sir, you have too much intelligence and fairness to blame the pledge or the temperance societies for this. Objectionable as you consider the pledge as not giving support of the best kind, you would have some persons try it, such as you consider to possess "a feeble will." But those persons of feeble will are those who cannot keep the pledge and cannot govern their appetites without it. "It is wise," you say, "to place reliance upon nothing but moral improvement in the community, as a permanent means of advancing the temperance cause." Nobody understands this better than our temperance societies, and their main efforts are, and always have been, to induce a higher moral standard in relation to the use and abuse of intoxicating beverages. If the efforts of this kind among the temperate men of all past time had been successful in persuading every one, or almost all convivial young men and others not young, "ere they had lost their sober thinking," to exercise "just wit enough to leave off drinking," such a thing as a temperance society had never been organized.

Perhaps you do not believe in temperance societies per se; if you do, why not organize one upon your own acknowledged principles? I for one would wish it a hearty God-speed in all the good it would or could accomplish. The first temperance societies were based upon exactly those principles in respect of those healthy beverages—wine, beer, cider, and other fermented liquors; requiring only abstinence from distilled spirits and intemperate use of the others; but in spite of all effort, the members of the society would be found in the condition of Rear Admiral Noah, except that they would be walking the streets as well as they could instead of lying in their tents; and when some steady member would say, "I saw you drunk," they would reply, "Yes, but not upon distilled liquor."

Your objections to prohibitory laws may have some just and reasonable grounds, so far as they may be, or are, relied on to do the work which can only be effected by moral effort, or in so far as they may invade constitutional or inalienable rights. You are right in saying that "the only temperance reform that is good for anything, or that can stand the test of time, must be based on the enlightened conscience of the people, and not on any enactments of the government."

I would not unfairly charge upon any one the intentional making up of a false issue, but prohibitory laws never have been, to my knowledge, adopted or enacted as reforming, but as restraining, influences or punitive measures, to be applied to those persons who refused to be reformed, and persisted in making themselves and their vocation public nuisances. The State looks upon shops kept for open drinking purposes and the retailing of intoxicating liquors as public nuisances which ought to be abated. They are an offence to the moral instincts of all, or almost all, good citizens; and when we consider what must be the only motive for a man to keep a dram-shop—that is, to obtain the pence of those who are travelling the downward road to ruin—we may justly conclude he is a bad man who cares not what misery he inflicts or promotes, provided he thereby gets money.

I never believed the laws of Massachusetts or of Maine, so far as I have understood them, would produce the conversion of anybody, or even effect the purpose for which they were enacted; but I have been willing the trial should be made, and I will never be found with the enemy, whether drinker or seller, howling upon the track of those who are striving, although illogically, to produce one of the most important reforms of which the world ever stood in need.

Any statute, enacted against any evil practice by which money is made, will be resisted, violated, and evaded in all sorts of ways, and the mistakes of its supporters made use of as effective weapons against their purpose: for—

> "No rogue ere felt the halter draw,
> With good opinion of the law."

I think there might be effective prohibitory laws perfectly constitutional, but then resistance would be made in the name of liberty and justice.

There is no possible reform, although it might be conducted with the combined wisdom and unanimous agreement of all the wisest men that live, or ever have lived, or ever will live, that will not meet with opposition from those whose pockets or vices are affected by it; and they will always cry out that their liberties are attacked. The Elector of Saxony asked Erasmus what reason the Pope and the monks had for their violent opposition to Luther. "Ah! reason enough," said Erasmus; "he has touched the Pope upon the crown and the monks upon the belly." Let him that readeth understand and make the application.

You charge against the stringent statutes in some of the States against liquor-selling a large share of the blame for the present reaction, and you have charged upon other measures, such as the women's praying movement, the blame of reaction in those quarters. It may be so. An old lady once said to me, "The wicked always live on the sins of God's people." "That is a fact, my dear madam," I replied, "and they don't live lean; the pity is that they can find so much to live on."

There has not been a year since the first report of the first temperance society, nearly half a century ago, that the opposition have not charged upon the temperance movement all the intemperance that continued to prevail, especially all the reaction that ever took place.

So far as the intolerance and inconsistencies of the New England Temperance Convention extended, and any other similar action of temperance societies, I abandon them to your censure without a word of defence.

I feel that there is much more for me to write, if I should pen the thoughts with which I am filled; but, not to occupy too many of your columns, and not to be tedious to readers, I remain

Yours for the right and true,

D. S. Grandin, M.D.

Upper Gloucester, Me., Oct. 4.

"It was from a continually increasing experience of the stability of Nature, and from the multiplying inroads which science (or knowledge) made on superstitious fear, that man rose to pure and yet purer conceptions of the cause of all things. Natural science was his first step towards the mastery of the world; theology was his second step, and this was towards the mastery of the universe! Not till the return of the morning sun came to be an always-to-be-expected fact did gratitude, in any real or lasting sense, take form in the heart of man. If gratitude did find a place before, it was not till after the fear that the sun would not return had vanished with the night. One of the earliest, if not the earliest, names for God was the name by which the all-embracing sky was known, thus showing the sequence of events. If then it is the intellect that first makes the idea of God possible to us, it is evident we must separate morality from theology, and either drop the use of the word religion or else substitute it for morality; nor need we go far for an example. The apostle James emphasizes pure and undefiled religion to consist in visiting the fatherless and the widow, and in keeping oneself unspotted from the world. What is this but pure morality? To the objection that the injunction to keep oneself unspotted from the world implies a belief in God, I must content myself at present with a denial. To admit it would be to say that the many good and earnest men who either deny the existence of a God, or from a conviction of their own inability to decide so momentous a question prefer to leave the matter open, are not virtuous! Let it be clearly understood that theology is one thing and morality (or religion, if you will) is another, and we shall find morality loved for its own sake. At present, the two are so linked together by the Church, that many a heart which cannot accept any of the current beliefs thinks it either unnecessary or impossible to do justly or to love mercy. There are many seeming objections to the theory that a wise and merciful God is over all; and those of us who, notwithstanding any apparent contradictions, and feeling our helplessness before the great problem of life, can trust in such a God should not hesitate to credit with real sincerity those who differ from us."—W. A. Leonard, in the London Unitarian Herald.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of ditorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Journal

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 1 Tremont Place, Boston.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
F. W. NEWMAN, England.
CHARLES VOYSEY, England.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

CHARLES SUMNER'S GREAT WORK.

PROPHETIC VOICES

CONCERNING AMERICA.

By CHARLES SUMNER.

Aside from its literary and historical merits, this volume has a special interest, from the fact that it was the last work on which Mr. Sumner was engaged before his death.

"PROPHETIC VOICES" will be found of great value to all who take an interest in the history of our country, so full is it of passages in which the unexampled prosperity of our land has been foretold by philosophers, poets, statesmen, and orators, of whom the lamented author has also given interesting sketches.

Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

A NEW, SEARCHING, TIMELY BOOK, entitled

"THE GENESIS AND ETHICS OF CONJUGAL LOVE."

By Andrew Jackson Davis.

Treatment of all the delicate and important questions involved in Conjugal Love is straightforward, unmistakably emphatic, and perfectly explicit and plain in every vital particular. Mr. Davis has recently examined the whole field of Marriage, Parentage, Disaffection, and Divorce, and this little volume is the result; which now comes into the world because it is now both wanted and needed by all women and men.

 Our friend Andrew Jackson Davis has written a book this time that concerns everybody, and on this side of the great river. It certainly touches their bosoms if not their business, and people who do not care a pin what Mr. Davis thinks of the Summer Land will be interested to see what he knows about conjugal love, and the duties of the marriage relation. His book has a table of contents as attractive as a Delmonico bill of fare.—Golden Age.

Price, in paper covers, 50 cents; in handsome cloth, 75 cents; in full gilt and extra binding, $1. Postage free. The trade supplied on the most liberal terms. Published by the "Progressive Publishing House" of A. J. DAVIS & CO., No. 24 East Fourth Street, New York City

MUSIC BOOKS FOR SCHOOLS.

AMERICAN

SCHOOL MUSIC READERS.

IN THREE BOOKS.

By L. O. Emerson and W. S. Tilden.

In Book I., which is for Primary Schools, we have a three years' course of study very plainly laid out, with abundant directions to teachers, and a large number of sweet songs for the little ones to sing by rote and by note. Price 35 cents.

In Book II. the course above indicated is continued, and becomes a little more theoretic. The book is fitted for the use of the younger scholars in Grammar Schools. Price 50 cents.

In Book III. part singing is introduced, and the ear is trained to harmonic singing. For higher classes in Grammar Schools. Price 50 cents.

The music in these charming and useful books was selected and arranged by the practiced hand of Mr. L. O. Emerson, and the theoretic part has been well tested by Mr. Tilden before placing in the Readers.

For High Schools nothing succeeds the above Readers better than "THE HOUR OF SINGING" [$1.00], already in extensive use. If that has been used, try "CHOICE TRIOS" [$1.00], a collection of the best three-part music.

The new Singing School Book, "THE SONG MONARCH" [75 cents], is attracting general attention as one of the Best Books ever made for Singing Schools.

The above books sent post-paid on receipt of retail price.

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

We have already issued three editions, the last of which is nearly exhausted.

We desire soon to issue

Another Large Edition

of this and other tracts on the subject, so that we can place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

Last winter this subject was brought before the Legislature of the State, and many petitions were presented asking a repeal of these unjust laws.

The matter is still in their hands, and at the next session will undoubtedly be acted upon. Meanwhile the favoring justice and equity, should be distinctly heard.

We shall soon be ready to send out

thus giving an opportunity to those who have not already done so, to protest against this continued wrong.

Let us make it

ever presented to our legislative body.

Will those willing to assist in circulating these petitions please

SEND IN THEIR NAMES?

We would say, also that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

PILE UP LIES till they touch the firmament: one breath of truth blows them out of space.

THE OLD CATHOLICS refuse to enter into communion with any Protestant church except the Episcopalian.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH is again in America, and will receive, we doubt not, a most cordial welcome from the warm friends he made here last year.

THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CONVENTION has gone dead against the proposal to revise the antiquated Nicene Creed. Query: is not that better named the Miocene Creed?

CHURCH PROPERTY is now taxable in the District of Columbia, as it ought to be everywhere. The assessed value of church lots there is $1,000,000, while the buildings are estimated at the present market value of $500,000.

THE "CHRISTIAN UNION" of Chicago has secularized itself, admitted Jews to office, and changed its name to the "Chicago Athenæum." It has 1200 members. Mr. George M. Pullman is President, and Rev. C. W. Wendte Secretary. Another sign of the times.

A BAPTIST DIVINE, Rev. William Isaac Loomis, has discovered that Sir Isaac Newton is a blunderer; that the law of gravitation is a "mental illusion;" and that Moses knew more than Newton in natural science. The world will be on thorns till it finds out which of the two Isaacs is a lunatic.

THE PRESBYTERIAN SYNOD of Northern Illinois has decided to let Professor Patton "persecute" Dr. Swing a little more, by entertaining the former's appeal from the decision of the lower tribunal. The Professor wants to be the great Pattern of the Presbyterians. But we never could see why those who want to cut loose from Evangelical standards of faith should not also cut loose from Evangelical fellowships, which are necessarily based on those standards. Hence our sympathy for the Swings is greatest when they voluntarily "come out."

THE AMERICAN Episcopalians are uneasy at the prospect of another Pan-Anglican Conference. They dread lest the Archbishop of Canterbury should become practically, by the organic union of all branches of the Anglican Church, a sort of Episcopalian Pope. No doubt they are sagacious in this apprehension. The same causes which created the Roman Papacy will tend to create an Anglican Papacy, just as soon as the logic of Christianity begins to make itself felt in the consolidated church. Peter's confession, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," approved by Jesus and preached by the apostles, was a seed out of which nothing can grow but Papacies, great or small, to the end of time. Beware of accepting the premise, all ye who dread the conclusion!

PRESIDENT GRANT, in his speech at the unveiling of the Lincoln statue at Springfield, Illinois, on October 15, thus awkwardly testified to the Orthodoxy of the Martyr President: "His faith in an all-wise Providence, directing our aims, was the faith of the Christian that his Redeemer liveth, amidst obloquy, personal abuse, and hate undisguised, and which was given vent to without restraint through the press, upon the stump, and in private circles." Notwithstanding the fact that Abraham Lincoln was an unbeliever in the "essentials" of Christianity, the Orthodox are determined to make him out a Christian; and they were shrewd enough to secure Presidential testimony for their side on this great occasion. We shall never hear the last of Grant's bungling affidavit that Lincoln was a Christian.

THE RIOTING at Northampton, England, after Mr. Bradlaugh's defeat in the election for Parliament, is fully explained in the National Reformer, his own journal. It seems that his followers, exasperated against Mr. Fowler, whose running against Mr. Bradlaugh split the Liberal party and elected Mr. Merewether, the conservative candidate, attacked Mr Fowler's hotel and did some damage; but Mr. Bradlaugh rushed into the crowd, "thrashed one or two of his most zealous adherents," and for the moment quelled the disturbance. He left for America, however, at nine o'clock in the evening; and the riot broke out afresh after he had gone. We are very glad that he is wholly guiltless of the affair, but heartily chagrined that his reckless followers should disgrace themselves and their cause by such brutal violence.

THIS EXTRACT from a sermon by the famous Jonathan Edwards shows what progress has been made in the last hundred years: "The God who holds you over the pit of hell, much as one holds a spider or some loathsome insect over the fire, abhors you, and is dreadfully provoked. You are ten times as abominable in His eyes as the most venomous and hateful serpent is in ours. It would be no wonder if persons who sit here now, quiet and secure in the meeting-house, should be in hell before to-morrow morning." Such preaching would scarcely be tolerated to-day, except in the backwoods. Yet the doctrine of "salvation by Christ alone," which is still preached as vigorously as ever, means exactly what Edwards said, or it means nothing. There is little enough to respect in a Christianity which dares not stand by its own principles.

LAST SUNDAY EVENING a large meeting was held in Faneuil Hall, the old "Cradle of Liberty," to promote prison reform, and to devise ways of helping prisoners to become good citizens. Wendell Phillips and others made addresses; and Burnham Wardwell announced that steps were already taking to establish an institution to aid discharged prisoners. There is a society in this State for this purpose now, which is doing much in this direction; but more still should be done, not only here, but in all the States. No convict should be discharged without having been taught to earn an honest livelihood by skilled labor, which is unfortunately not always the case now; and special assistance is needed to secure employment for prison inmates on their liberation. Make the prison a school of practical instruction in honest work, and fewer convicts will reënter it.

THE MASSACHUSETTS Young Men's Christian Associations have just held their eighth annual convention. The Boston Association alone reported a membership of 2,300, "about 900 of them active." What they are "active" about is perhaps explained in part by the following resolution, one of a series reported by the committee on resolutions: "Resolved, That we recommend to the convention not to divorce religion from politics, but in every political canvass to conscientiously and prayerfully use their influence in sustaining such men and measures as will, in their opinion, best serve the interests of morality and temperance." This smooth phraseology means in plain English ("morality" being inseparable from "faith") that only Evangelical Christians should be elected to public office; and to secure this result is undoubtedly one of the chief objects of the Young Men's Christian Association. In all political questions involving the interests of Evangelical Christianity (and they are multiplying daily), a compact, well-organized body of practical workers stands ready for "active" exertions in support of "such men and measures" as shall promote them. No wonder that it is such an herculean task to unloose the Church's grip from the State! Protestantism is drilling its Jesuits for the coming struggle, and means to be prepared. But what is Liberty doing?

Tax-Exemption in Massachusetts.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 28, 1874.

The Committee on Just and Equal Taxation, to whom was referred the petition of the executive committe of the Boston Liberal League for the enactment of laws securing just and equal taxation, and the petition of Phineas E. Gay and 1,150 others of Boston, and numerous other petitions, in aid of said first mentioned petition; also the Bill introduced by Mr. Whiting, of Pembroke, for the taxation of religious and charitable corporations,

REPORT:

That they have heard the statements, facts, and arguments presented and urged in behalf of the petitioners; also the statements, facts, and arguments presented and urged by numerous remonstrants; and have, so far as they have been able, duly considered the same; that they find the subject opens a wide field for inquiry and investigation, involving the consideration of a multitude of facts and the most important questions of State policy, and that a proper, careful, and thorough inquiry and investigation require more time and attention than they have been able to give, and more than can well be given by a committee sitting only occasionally during the session of the Legislature; that they are not prepared to recommend any change in the laws relating to exemptions from taxation, at this time, but, believing that the importance of the subject, and its general interest to the people and tax-payers of the State, will justify the appointment of a commission, with authority to sit during the recess of the Legislature, to call such witnesses and make such inquiry and investigation as they deem proper relative to the laws relating to taxation and the exemptions therefrom, and make a full report in print to the next General Court, they recommend the passage of the accompanying resolve.

Per order, SAMUEL O. LAMB.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In the Year One Thousand Eight Hundred and Seventy-Four.

authorizing the appointment of a commission to inquire into the expediency of revising and amending the laws of the State relating to taxation and the exemptions therefrom.

Resolved, That the Governor and Council be and they are hereby authorized to appoint a commission, consisting of three suitable persons, to sit during the recess of the Legislature, to inquire into the expediency of revising and amending the laws of the State relating to taxation and the exemptions therefrom, with authority to call witnesses, and to report in full, in print, to the next General Court.

VIEWS OF MR. WHITING, OF PEMBROKE.

The undersigned, being a small minority of the Committee on Just and Equal Taxation, to whom were referred the petitions praying for the repeal of the laws exempting the property of religious, charitable, and other corporations from taxation, offer the following Report:—

While endorsing generally the views of our colleagues of the Committee concerning the magnitude of the subject submitted to our consideration, and the difficulties with which it is manifestly fraught, we are utterly unable to recognize the wisdom or fitness of the conclusion to which they have arrived; namely, that the whole matter should be referred to the next General Court. Nor can we feel that our duty would be discharged, by remitting entirely to our successors the responsibility of action, unless it can be shown that they will possess some peculiar advantages for exhaustive investigation, which have been denied to ourselves. The work to which we were appointed cannot, we think, with propriety, be ignored, or turned over to others, without at least such an effort as shall show that we have not weakly sought to evade what we were unable, or unwilling, to perform. Circumstances now beyond control will preclude a succeeding Legislature from deriving any assistance whatever from our labors, and the whole ground will have to be explored afresh.

The investigations which we have pursued these many weeks have strengthened and confirmed the convictions that exemption from taxation as a matter of State policy is only justifiable in the isolated cases in which the parties exempted are doing essentially the work of the State; that it is, under all other circumstances, a wrong inflicted on the people, an error in political economy, which has wrought great mischief in the past history of our race, and whose possible developments in the future may well excite anxiety and apprehension in thoughtful and patriotic minds.

To check the undue growth of this system, and restrain it within proper limits, is now comparatively an easy task, while its unlimited expansion will, by the iron logic by which the future is continually eliminating itself from the past, at no distant period, bid defiance to peaceful remedy, and leave to our descendants only the dread alternative of slavish submission to an intolerable burden, or wholesale confiscation and forceful spoliation. The true prosperity and the only safety of corporate institutions, as of individuals, lie in hearty obedience to impartial laws, and in dividing equally the burden of taxation, which is only tolerable from the equality of its pressure.

The notion that the cause of religion and morality is advanced or benefited by the enforced pecuniary support of these corporations is rebuked by all past history, and is in direct conflict with the fundamental principles of our government. Further, it is quite apparent that even were our statutes of exemption otherwise unexceptionable, they are eminently defective, from the fact that under their operation the bounty of the State is bestowed in largest measure where it is least needed. There is no discrimination exercised, or rather, to speak more correctly, discrimination is made in the wrong direction. A powerful and wealthy corporation, by the release of its tax, receives a large gift which it does not need, while to the poor and feeble society the exemption is quite insignificant; an inequality which can only be remedied by causing State aid to such institutions to take the form of direct appropriations from the treasury.

The glory of the Christian religion consists in the fact that it is a voluntary system, and it seems to us but a poor and ignoble conception of its nature and intent to obtain, by indirection and force, either the assent or support of the public. The only cases in which religious corporations can justly claim exemption are those in which their privileges are extended to all, without distinction and without price. The few there are of this description, we think, may be justly classed under the head of pure charities, and their work as coincident with that of the State.

With these convictions, we have felt that we could not honestly shrink from an attempt to embody them in legislation, in the hope and belief that our efforts might become, at least, the nucleus of wise and just enactments.

We therefore report the accompanying Bill.

WILLIAM WHITING.

AN ACT

Concerning the Taxation of Religious, Charitable, and other Societies and Corporations.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, in General Court assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

SECT. 1. That on and after the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five, the property of musical, agricultural, and educational associations, other than colleges and town schools, heretofore exempted from taxation, shall be taxed the same as other descriptions of property.

SECT. 2. The property of religious and charitable associations, heretofore exempted from taxation, shall, except in the cases hereinafter mentioned, be taxed in the same manner as the corporations and societies named in the first section: provided, however, that all religious societies shall be entitled to hold property to the amount of five thousand dollars free from taxation.

SECT. 3. Religious and other societies, claiming to be purely charitable in purpose and administration, shall, before the date named in the first section of this act, make to the commission hereinafter established returns setting forth the purpose and location of such society, amount of endowment and whence derived, their annual receipts and expenditures, and the specific objects to which the latter have been devoted during the year last past, with the number and salaries of their officers.

SECT. 4. The Board of State Charities, together with the Tax Commissioner, shall constitute a commission to receive and examine the returns required in the third section of this act, and when it shall appear to their satisfaction that any society making such returns is a pure charity, they shall certify the same to the Tax Commissioner, and said society shall be exempt from taxation for the amount applied to charitable purposes: provided, however, that societies neglecting to make returns shall not benefit by the provisions of this act.

SECT. 5. The tax authorized by this act shall be assessed by the Tax Commissioner, and at the average rate of the State, county, and town tax for the year preceding. And the basis of valuation upon which the tax shall be assessed shall be the present value of property for the same or similar purposes to which it has been applied. And the Tax Commissioner is hereby authorized to require from all the societies and associations affected by this act such returns as may be found necessary to the discharge of his duty. And the compensation of the commission hereby created shall be fixed by the Governor and Council.

SECT. 6. This act shall take effect upon its passage, and all acts and parts of acts contrary to the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

VIEWS OF MR. MORSS, OF NEWBURYPORT.

The undersigned, a member of the Committee on Just and Equal Taxation, while agreeing, generally, in the conclusions arrived at by the majority of the Committee, yet differing somewhat in the premises, at the request of the Committee, respectfully asks leave to present his views on the matters at issue.

The question of taxation is one of the utmost importance in its bearing upon an industrial community. Among barbarous and semi-civilized nations, the capricious and often extortionate manner in which the strong arm of power levies its exactions upon the products of the soil, and the accumulations of industry and economy, deprives the people of all hope of improving their condition, and strikes with a fatal paralysis upon all efforts of ambition and enterprise to develop the resources of the country.

As nations advance in civilization, it is found that the basis of all prosperity in a community rests in the confidence which every individual entertains that any accumulation of property which he honestly obtains, through the exercise of good judgment, enterprise, skill, industry, or economy, is guaranteed to him as his own, to be used for the comfort and welfare of himself and his family. There can be no safety anywhere but with some accumulation. Even among an agricultural people, possessed of the most fertile soil and a genial climate, there will be years of famine as well as those of bountiful harvests; and the abundance of fruitful years must be stored and cared for, in order that it may be fed out in seasons of scarcity. If this is essential in agriculture, it is so to a much greater extent in other avocations, the rewards of which are not guaranteed to us with that regularity, certainty, and perpetuity, as are the seasons of seed-time and harvest.

In a free country, law should press as lightly as possible upon every individual, being enforced only so far as the preservation of public order and protection to life, liberty, and property make it necessary. There are a few things essential to the well-being of society, which can best be done under government superintendence, and must be provided for by taxation. First, for the preservation of public order and the punishment of crime, a police force, prisons, and courts are necessary. Next, the helpless poor, the insane, and imbecile, are to be cared for in almshouses and hospitals. Then streets and county roads can be constructed with more uniformity under public authority. Beyond this, government has assumed the education of the children in the community, on the theory that good education is the groundwork of all national prosperity and happiness.

There is, however, in all these objects of government expenditure a constant tendency to excess, which needs to be carefully and constantly guarded against. Our boards of commissioners, and all our officials, from the highest to the lowest, always discover that their departments need to be extended, and everywhere there is a steadily growing demand for increased expenditure—more help and more pay—which far outruns the ratio of increase in population and wealth, thus constantly increasing the burden of taxation.

While business was prosperous, under a large flow of foreign immigration, which almost every year created a new State upon our cheap and fertile lands along the Western frontier, and the artificial stimulus of an inflated paper currency was carried to the extremest point of tension, the increasing taxes for public expenditures were easily endured. But now, when our cheap lands have been so far appropriated that immigration is materially checked, and the expanded credit system can command confidence no farther, the margin of profit on all business for some years to come is likely to be so small that high taxation will be found a great and grievous burden upon the community.

The evil has been aggravated by the escape of a large amount of the most productive investments in the State from taxation. The profits of all industrial enterprise have been so small that capital is being gradually withdrawn from business for the purpose of investment in government bonds, and other securities which can be held without being subject to taxation.

The course of political events and financial legislation, during the last thirteen years, has tended to foster extravagant expenditures in every department of life, and the consequent inevitable reaction cannot fail to be felt with much severity.

Retrenchment is always difficult and unpleasant to those who have been accustomed to liberal expenditures, and the call which comes up to this Legislature is not for curtailment in expenditures, but for increased taxation. How this call should be met is the question to be determined.

It is found that in many towns a very considerable amount of capital is hidden away from taxation in savings banks. In some municipalities the amount invested in government bonds and savings banks has been so great as to seriously enhance the rate of taxation on all other property. The State has imposed a tax on savings banks of about one-half the average rate, and covered it into the State treasury. The tax upon these institutions, like that upon the national banks, should be for the benefit of the towns and cities where those who hold the investments reside, the State taking the tax on the investments of non-residents.

There is no disposition to tax the small investments of the working classes in our savings banks, although a large portion of these classes, particularly the foreign immigrants, generally withdraw their accumulations soon after, if not before, they have reached the amount allowed for the purchase of a dwelling; a practice worthy of encouragement, but which is rather discouraged at present, as while the investment is in the bank he is sensible of no tax, but the moment it is changed for the purchase of a home, it is then assessed at a full rate.

But there is a serious and growing evil in our savings banks, which, if not seasonably checked, will lead ultimately to more serious effects than escape from taxation, which is all that comes within the province of this Committee to consider. It is that they are becoming banks in which the wealthy classes, for whose benefit they were never designed, make large investments. These classes are finding it very convenient to realize dividends from savings banks, equal in amount to those received on government bonds, and without paying the high premium which is now required for government securities. This has gone on to a great extent, by placing money in different banks in the names of their children, and in some cases nominally as trustees. In one case the number of books held by one wealthy man has become known to the undersigned as twelve, of $1,000 each. In another case the number of books actually held by one individual was thirty-four.

By the last return of the savings banks, it appears that the amount of deposits held by them was $202,-195,343. Of this amount, $100,406,767 was loaned on mortgage of real estate, $35,260,386 on personal security, $23,037,493 on State, city, county, and town securities, $21,733,490 invested in bank stock, and only $9,215,429 in government bonds, which are the best and most quickly convertible of all securities for them to hold. The commissioner says, "There is no inducement to hold the bonds to secure exemption from taxation, and they are not found sufficiently remunerative to meet the wants of the banks in a pretty active effort to keep up the rate of interest paid by them."

In this connection it may be well to remark briefly concerning an argument that has been pressed strongly upon the Committee, relative to mortgaged property being twice taxed, that this is a palpable fallacy, which the simplest example will make manifest. For instance, to-day A has $10,000 in money, and to-morrow he lends this money to B on a pledge or mortgage of his real estate, as security for its payment. One is then taxed for his personal property, and the other for his real estate, just as they were before the pledge was given. The rule applies to all mortgaged property. It is held by the mortgagor for its income or for a prospective rise in value.

The next largest amount of property which is exempted from taxation, and can be reached by State legislation, is found in meeting-houses, or church buildings. The value of these is now estimated by the assessors at nearly $29,000,000, an increase of about $6,000,000 in the last three years. It is well argued against taxing these, that, without the religious teaching which flows from them, all our vast expenditures for public schools would be worth little or nothing to promote the welfare and happiness of the people, so that they are an essential and vital part of our educational system; that if private generosity, or associated effort, provides the buildings, the pulpit instruction, and the Sunday-school teaching, the State ought certainly to exempt the property used for such purposes from taxation. On the other hand, it is contended that we have abjured the idea of any pecuniary connection between Church and State, leaving every sect to take care of itself, and that consequently their possessions should be subject, like all other property, to taxation for the protection given to it by the government. It is farther argued that this property tends naturally and constantly to accumulation, and that we shall be liable in time to have great estates absorbed by the Church, and thus released from bearing their share of the necessary public charges, as has been the case to a very injurious extent in older countries and in past ages. Again, it is said that while in our cities many churches have become mere institutions of luxury and fashion, extravagance and show, others in the country have not unfrequently split up into half-starved and useless organizations; and that taxation will tend to break up these two extremes of church institutions which at present exert a deleterious influence on society.

The time may soon come when it will be well to tax all meeting houses the seats of which are not entirely free, without money and without price, to the public. This would, doubtless, temporarily serve a good purpose, and after the accomplishment of that purpose, if found to operate unfavorably, the law might at any time be repealed. Such a tax would also do something to open the eyes of a larger number of our people to the extravagance and wastefulness which have entered into every department of life; and also aid in demonstrating more clearly, what now seems to be but dimly understood, that a surfeit even of education in theology is useless and mischievous, and that it is quite possible here, as everywhere else, to have too much of a good thing.

The next list of exemptions, in magnitude, is that of educational institutions, other than public schools, amounting to thirteen millions of dollars, an increase of three and a half millions during the last three years. This includes colleges, academies, and private and denominational schools. The State has encouraged and aided these institutions, and there may well be some hesitation in subjecting them to taxation. But the same reasons exist for requiring them to bear their share of the costs of maintaining a police, and contributing to other municipal expenditures, which applies to meeting-houses, which give moral and religious instruction; or even to factories, which furnish remunerative employment to great numbers of people, not unfrequently when the proprietors are incurring losses in their investments.

Education is of great value, but there may be a glut of it, as of everything else. Even now there seems to be more offered in the market than there is mind at hand to carry away. Daniel Webster once said there is always room in the upper stories of professional and educated life. And he was right; because all the schools and all the teachers in the world cannot suffice to place one there. He must climb to the position with his own intellectual power and earnest and self-denying effort. But the lower stories are often crowded with a jostling, half-starved multitude, as useless, for all the benefit they confer on society, as the mendicant friars of the Middle Ages. A close observer cannot fail to perceive that even our common schools have, in many places, been pampered into luxury and extravagance by the fashion of the day for profuse expenditure. Their education in the multitude of studies has become superficial, showy, and transitory, rather than thorough, valuable, and permanent.

The time will doubtless come when State control in intellectual education will be found as unwise as it has been demonstrated to be in religious culture. Taking away the control of our public schools from the municipalities, and placing it in hands where it is virtually ruled by an oligarchy composed of the secretary of the board of education, and the county teachers' associations, is already working evil. This oligarchy is interested mainly in large expenditures, no matter how unwise or useless. They have actually fixed the standard of merit, in towns and cities, at the number of dollars per head expended for education, wholly unmindful that, valuable as is right education, there is nothing upon which money can be more uselessly and rapidly wasted, when it is given in a wrong direction, and that a single dollar, wisely and judiciously applied, is better than a hundred wasted and squandered.

The scarcity of good teachers, who now command better pay than any other class in the community, employed the same number of hours in the year, proves that our higher educational institutions have not improved in practical usefulness. On the whole, there seems to be no sufficient reason why these institutions should not share in the burdens of municipal expenditure, until the rate of taxation from a revival of business or proper retrenchment in expenditure comes to press less heavily upon the community. There may be an outcry about a tax upon knowledge; but is not knowledge considered the key to power and wealth?

The remaining exempted class is benevolent and charitable institutions, about $6,000,000 in amount. Where these are free to the relief of all classes in the community, without fee or favoritism, exemption may be proper; but where they are instituted for particular classes, and require fees of any kind, there is no good reason for exemption. The property of agricultural societies is small, but should come under the general rule.

It is probable, however, that the people of the Commonwealth are not yet prepared for so radical a change in the law, as to subject all these classes of property to indiscriminate taxation. Ultimately, if no retrenchment of public expenditures can be made, and taxation is continued so onerously upon the industrial classes, popular opinion may demand the taxation of these exempted classes of property, in whole or in part. It is desirable, however, that the matter should be considered more fully in detail, and matured more carefully than is possible at this time. Our taxes are not only heavy, but unfortunately still have a tendency to increase. For several years past, under a state of active business and apparently great prosperity, the people, individually and collectively, have not been sufficiently prudent and economical, in view of the certainty of future reactionary depression. Debts have been incurred and money too profusely expended in years of prosperity, so that now, with greatly reduced means, the payment of even the interest has become a great burden. Luxury, pride, and extravagance have been too much encouraged in public as well as private expenditures. It is not to be disguised that the tendency to extravagance in State expenditures is quite as marked as that in the cities and towns. There seems to be a love for increasing the number and disbursements of its boards of commissioners and other officials, who have already crowded the spacious State House and flowed over into Pemberton Square.

Another year will doubtless throw much additional light on all these questions. The next Legislature will have a better opportunity and more time to revise the exemption laws, and the subject will become more familiarized and better understood among the people than it is at the present time.

A PHRENOLOGIST told a man that he had combativeness very largely developed, and was of a quarrelsome disposition. "That isn't so," said the man, angrily, "and if you repeat it, I'll knock you down."

"WHERE ARE YOU going?" asked a little boy of another, who had slipped on an icy pavement. "Going to get up," was the blunt reply.

[For THE INDEX.]

SPENCER AND TYNDALL.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

THE INDEX of September 17 contains an editorial upon "Tyndall's Address." In this article you lay some sturdy blows upon the professor's back, and not only upon his back, but, over his shoulders, you reach the back of Mr. Herbert Spencer also. To this, doubtless, neither of these gentlemen would object. Probably they would both agree with what you say to others concerning yourself: "The closer your argument, and the nearer home you strike"—so much the better. But can you possibly imagine either of these two gentlemen replying to an opponent (say to Mr. Abbot himself) in the same tone which you employ toward them? Read the articles of Professor Tyndall in the unpleasant controversy in which he has been engaged with the friends of Principal Forbes, or the recent replies of Mr. Spencer to his English critics, and at once we are struck with the extreme deference paid to the opinion of adversaries, while we admire the unflinching firmness with which their own positions are sustained. Can we imagine Mr. Spencer speaking of Mr. Abbot's philosophical articles as "empty gibberish"? Or Professor Tyndall ridiculing his criticism as "meaningless jargon"? Or either or both referring to the "unutterable shallowness" of his theological views? We can hardly conceive of these men employing such terms. Yet I quote these three phrases from one short column of THE INDEX, all thrown at a philosophical belief held by Mr. Spencer, Professor Tyndall, Du Bois Reymond, a large number of the leading scientific workers of the world, and probably by a larger per centage of the readers of THE INDEX than could be found to subscribe to any other one article of belief.

I do not need to recall to your mind the many works for which this generation is indebted to Mr. Spencer. He has developed the outlines of a philosophy of Evolution which has already won the assent of leading thinkers everywhere; he has added to the science of Biology much that renders the specialists in that science his acknowledged debtors; he has unfolded a new Psychology, with a vigor of thought and breadth of learning as yet unsurpassed; and still, these works, enough to win permanent reputation for several different men, are only steps toward the preparation of his greatest work, that upon Sociology, a work which is certain to prove of incalculable benefit to unnumbered generations. These great claims to our regard will be undisputed by even the bitterest opponents of his philosophy of "the Unknowable." And yet this man you accuse of "empty gibberish" in the development of a point of his philosophy, which point, whether true or false, does not affect the essential principles of Evolution, however important it may be from other points of view. Indeed, Professor Tyndall says that Mr. Spencer's views are certain to be modified, and I doubt if Mr. Spencer himself would object to this statement. Only let us remember that no one, as yet, has succeeded in modifying this particular point; and can you wonder, therefore, that it is provisionally accepted until something better is furnished? But this provisional acceptance, friend Abbot, seems to make you almost angry. Suppose your readers should allow your writings to stir them up in the same way. Thus, in this same editorial, there is a paragraph, which I will not specify, in which, as it seems to me, you have made a sad mistake,—that of allowing yourself to be deceived into putting a mere verbal phrase instead of a thing. This is, of course, a mistake to which we are all greatly liable (a very frequent mistake of Aristotle, according to Professor Tyndall); but would it be quite fair in me, because I think you have made this mistake, to cry out that I will not "be juggled with"? On the contrary, it would require more proofs than I care to add together to drive me to imagine that Mr. Abbot would ever "juggle" with anybody. Familiar as you are, of course, with the many admirable minor essays of Mr. Spencer, let me ask you if you think the author of the brief essay on "Style" is a man likely to write "meaningless jargon" when explaining that which he considers an important point of his philosophy. Your concession that Mr. Spencer is "in many respects indubitably great" (which would be faint praise from Dr. McCosh) hardly offsets that which you say about him in the rest of your article.

May I speak "right out in meeting," as you say? When you reviewed Mr. Spencer, some years ago, it is possible (is it not?) that you then made a few mistakes, a very few, that you would not make if writing to-day. Is it possible that the remembrance of Mr. Spencer's correction of those mistakes (if you made them) still prejudices you against him? I ask, for the reason that some of your friends have noticed seemingly the remains of some old grudge or prejudice in your references to Mr. Spencer, which prevents exact justice to the man who, whatever his errors, has done more than any other man living to check the "jargon" and "gibberish" of those systems of belief against which you are so earnestly battling to-day. Pardon me, if, in the above, I seem to be hypercritical, or in any way unjust to you.

I believe I have never before troubled the readers of THE INDEX with any communication. May I ask, therefore, for a little further space for a few questions upon the substance of your editorial?

You say: "It will, we believe, be found that the present materialistic conception of substantial atoms . . . . must dissolve . . . . into that of pure forces," etc. Granting this to be true, though we have not yet sufficent reasons for accepting it, and admitting that "this conception is the reverse of materialistic in the ordinary meaning of the word,"—yet in what way will it affect Professor Tyndall's argument? For his definition of materialistic is certainly not "the ordinary meaning of the word." If he be "driven to make a still more radical change in his notions of matter," will not this change only strengthen his argument for seeing in "matter," as newly defined, "the promise and potency of every form and quality of life"? You seem yourself to admit this when you say: "Where the essential idea of matter has been thus revolutionized, it is of little consequence whether matter or spirit is selected as the most fitting name." Our conceptions of matter continually change with every important addition to our knowledge of physics and chemistry, and one great beauty of Professor Tyndall's argument, to me, has been the apparent fact that hardly any legitimate change in the definition of matter will impair the clearness and force of his main position.

Again, quoting from Professor Tyndall, "The whole process of evolution is the manifestation of a Power absolutely inscrutable to the intellect of man," you say: "The Power which manifests itself manifests itself, does it not?" I answer, Yes, certainly; but why need a Power manifest itself? Are you not, in this phrase, unconsciously begging the question at issue? "Manifests itself," in the first half of the question, is your phrase, not Tyndall's or Spencer's; and you seem to admit the possibility of something else, just above, where you ask, "Are we then shut down to the submissive acknowledgment that evolution is the manifestation of a Power which does not manifest itself? If so," etc. To my mind there is a clear distinction, which may be infinitely broad, between the manifestation of a Power which does not manifest itself, and the manifestation of a Power which does manifest itself. If this distinction exists in the mind of Professor Tyndall, as it certainly does in my own, and as I understand him to affirm, then is your sentence quite correct which begins: "The Power which confessedly manifests itself"? I do not understand that either Tyndall or Spencer confesses.

Again, you speak of "his (Tyndall's) illimitable multitude of self-subsistent molecules." I have never considered Professor Tyndall to believe in anything of the kind. The word "self-subsistent," here introduced so innocently, really changes the entire question so completely that I think Professor Tyndall would say that, if this be your conception of his belief, your arguments in opposition are addressed to some one else, not to him.

Again, you say: "The way out of Tyndall's imperfect materialism is clear through it into," etc. Is not this rather rhetorical than satisfactory? If not, will you sometime frame an argument which shall really go through Tyndall's materialism into the modified pantheism with which you seem to desire to replace it? For, you will admit, no such argument has ever yet been put into print. I am all ready to go through, whenever I see an opening, but I confess my inability to see one as yet.

Again, and last (for I restrain a desire to mention several more points, having mercy upon your readers, if not upon you), do you not suppose that Professor Tyndall believes in "the free effort of man to expand, elevate, enlarge, beautify—in one word, perfect—his own nature in all its aspects"? And do you not believe in that "deep-set feeling which has incorporated itself in the religions of the world"? Is it quite right, then, to say that Professor Tyndall, any more than yourself, would make "a divorce between science and religion"? Certainly, to me, both yourself and Professor Tyndall seem to believe in both science and religion to the fullest possible extent, and the difference between you is simply with regard to how much shall be called science and how much shall be called religion; a difference, not of fact, but only of the breadth of definition which shall be allowed to two words. Put the two words together, and your different definitions will cover the same amount of ground with equal closeness. Why dispute, then, about the relative size of the blankets? Rather put the emphasis upon the agreement, and use both words for all that they can be made to cover.

I do not expect you to give a full answer to my questions. This would take more space than THE INDEX can spare. I trust only that you will recognize them as legitimate questions, belonging to the discussion of the problems involved, and believe that they are written in the spirit of the admirable words, so well put by Professor Tyndall in the mouth of Bishop Butler, in "the unswerving faith that what is good and true in both our arguments will be preserved for the benefit of humanity, while all that is bad or false will disappear."

Truly yours,

MIXED SCHOOLS AT THE SOUTH.

THE EXPERIMENT FAIRLY TRIED IN LOUISIANA—NO EVIL RESULTS FOLLOW—THE ATTENDANCE OF WHITE CHILDREN LARGER THAN EVER BEFORE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRIBUNE:

Sir,—The letter of Senator Brownlow to the Hon. Truman Smith, which appeared in the Tribune on the 5th inst., like the letter of the latter gentleman on the same subject, has attracted my attention. Both letters were aimed at the Civil Rights Bill now pending in Congress, and special stress is laid upon the feature of the bill which proposes to secure equality of privileges to the pupils of both races in the public schools of the country. The assertion is made that the passage of the bill will end the free school systems in the Southern States, and it would seem to be the hope that a fear of this result will deter Congress from the final passage of this measure that prompts the making of this assertion.

It should be observed that no proofs are given by either Mr. Brownlow or Mr. Smith in support of their theory. They do not point to a single instance of a school system having become a failure by reason of its impartial application to the pupils of both races. Had they pointed to Louisiana, the only Southern State wherein the question of mixed schools has been squarely tested, they would have had a proof, not of the soundness of their logic, but of its utter unsoundness. There, during the years from 1868 to 1872, the period in which I was State Superintendent of Education, the issue of mixed schools came, and was squarely and fearlessly met. The Constitution of 1868 provided that the public schools of the State should be open alike to blacks and whites, and the oath of office in that commonwealth provides that every public officer shall see that no citizen is denied any civil or political right because of race, color, or previous condition. If, when the trial of mixed schools was made, the school system had been destroyed, Mr. Brownlow and Mr. Smith would claim that they had an unanswerable argument in support of their position. Seeing that the schools were mixed, and that the school system, instead of being injured, became more of a blessing than ever, may I not claim this to be a very strong argument in favor of the Civil Rights Bill? Has either of these gentlemen offered as good a one?

There was all the clamor against civil rights as to the Louisiana schools, by the Democratic press and its supporters, that there is now in Tennessee against the pending bill in Congress. There were in Louisiana, at that time, Republicans who as bitterly opposed equality in the schools as did the Democrats. They joined with their party opponents in the belief that the mixture of the two races in the schools would be attended by more harm than good. The hatred of the friends of free schools was so intense that creation was ransacked for terms of reproach severe enough to suit both their temper and the occasion which they deemed so very grave. When the question was boiled down to a very nice point, and when I was carefully reflecting as to the wisdom of excluding any of the colored applicants to our schools because of their color, I must confess that it was a serious matter; the more so for this reason: Admitting, for argument's sake, that a black child might better be excluded from a white school, what was I to do with children who were half white and half black? Again, what was to be done with those applicants who were three-quarters white and one-quarter black? Again, thinking of the future, I said, "If I exclude these children now, then I help put upon them and their posterity a brand of disgrace which has its birth in wrong, which is at war with the spirit of equality that inspired the makers of the Declaration of Independence, and, above all, one so utterly in conflict with the spirit and teachings of Christianity as to render me unworthy of my opportunities and responsibilities, and deserving only of the contempt of all just men if I were guilty of it." With these thoughts and feelings I issued an order through the newspapers, to the effect that from a certain date all the public schools should be open to the children of the various districts, regardless of race, color, or previous condition. On the publication of this order I was advised to leave the State of Louisiana. In one day I received as many as one hundred written notices to the effect that unless I left I would be assassinated; and one letter contained a picture of my coffin. This intimidation did not move me.

The day came for the opening of the schools. As expected, the colored children came with books in hand. The whites were ahead of them. Seeing the colored children admitted, the white pupils all left. (I speak now of those schools where this test was made.) I sat in my cab anxiously beholding the result of my own course. For awhile I confess I was full of sorrow. I thought I had been guilty of an indiscretion which bordered closely on crime, and yet I felt as if I was squarely meeting an issue imposed upon me by my oath of office. Well, the white pupils left, and the colored ones took their places. This was the result one day.

Now for another aspect of the case. The day on which this took place, I saw, at the close of school hours, the children who had left and those who took their places—the whites and the blacks—playing together, as usual, on the green, under the wide-spreading live-oaks. This sight prompted me to ask some of the white pupils why they ran away from school in the morning? The answer was: "Our parents told us to leave if colored children were admitted." Then I asked: "Why do you play with colored children?" The answer was, "Because we want to—we do so all the time." This convinced me that there was really no antagonism between the children of the two races except that which sprang from older persons, who were possessed of the bitter prejudices derived from slavery first, and from the war subsequently. The next day came, with the excitement somewhat abated; and then, very soon, the whites, seeing no prospect of a change of policy, sent their children back to school, and the year actually closed with a larger number of white pupils in the schools than ever before.

Little over a year ago, when in New Orleans, I took pains to visit some of the largest and best schools of the city, then under the charge of the Hon. Mr. Brown, my successor. I saw some of the children of the best white citizens of the city sitting alongside of colored children, and I may add that the latter were as neatly clad and as well behaved as the former. I ascertained then that there were colored pupils in every public school in New Orleans, and that there was no trouble whatever from that source.

Now I would like to ask Mr. Truman Smith and Mr. Brownlow if it be true, as they assert, that the passage of the Civil Rights Bill will break up the free schools of the South, why were not the free schools of Louisiana broken up under the operation of exactly the same principle as that embraced by the Civil Rights Bill?

The truth is (and it is not difficult to determine it) that the opposition to this bill springs from a Southern passion for a hobby with the negro in it—not from the negro by reason of his color, but the negro because he is a Republican. It is a well-known fact that the Southern whites have less prejudice against the persons of the blacks than the whites of the North. The prejudice is against the negro being Republican in party politics. Let the Civil Rights Bill pass, and thus end the negro question as one of party politics, and you will find an end to the kind of tumult now so common in the South. The idea that the passage of the bill will end the free schools of the South is without other foundation than that on which has rested the opposition to emancipation, the right to bear witness in courts, the right to sit on juries, the right to vote, and the right to hold office. When each of these steps was taken we were told that the white people of the South would be injured, disgraced, degraded.

Probably Gen. Beauregard was as jealous of the honor of his race as is either the Hon. Truman Smith or the Hon. Mr. Brownlow. There can be no doubt that he was just as capable as either of these honorable gentlemen of forming a judgment as to what was best for the good of the two races in the South. What does Gen. Beauregard say? Witness the following report of a committee on resolutions of which he was chairman. This was at a unification meeting in New Orleans, in July, 1873. At this meeting it was proposed that the whites and blacks should henceforth act in all public matters as one people. The following is Gen. Beauregard's report. It is signed by five white Democrats and five colored Republicans:—

"Resolved, That henceforward we dedicate ourselves to the unification of our people.

"Resolved, That by 'our people' we mean all men, of whatever race, color, or religion, who are citizens of Louisiana, and who are willing to work for her prosperity.

"Resolved, That we shall advocate by speech, and pen, and deed the equal and impartial exercise by every citizen of Louisiana of every civil and political right guaranteed by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and by the laws of honor, brotherhood, and fair dealing.

"Resolved, That we shall maintain and advocate the right of every citizen of Louisiana, and of every citizen of the United States, to frequent at will all places of resort, and to travel at will on all vehicles of public conveyance upon terms of perfect equality with any and every other citizen, and we pledge ourselves, so far as our influence, counsel, and example may go, to make this right a live and practical right; and that there may be no misunderstanding of our views on this point—

"First: We shall recommend to the proprietors of all places of public resort in the State of Louisiana the opening of said places to the patronage of both races inhabiting our State.

"Second: And we shall further recommend that all railroads, steamboats, steamships, and other public conveyances pursue the same policy.

"Third: We shall further recommend that our banks, insurance offices, and other public corporations recognize and concede to our colored fellow-citizens, where they are stockholders in such institutions, the right of being represented in the direction thereof.

"Fourth: We shall further recommend that hereafter no distinction shall exist among citizens of Louisiana in any of our public schools or State institutions of education, or in any other public institution supported by the State, city, or parishes.

"Fifth: That we pledge our honor and good faith to exercise our moral influence, both through personal advice and personal example, to bring about the rapid removal of all prejudice heretofore existing against the colored citizens of Louisiana, in order that they may hereafter enjoy all the rights belonging to citizens of the United States.

The above, like the experience I have rehearsed as to the public school work, goes to show that all this clamor against the Civil Rights Bill is a misrepresentation of what will follow the passage of that bill.

SUNDAY EVENINGS FOR THE PEOPLE.

The advent of autumn, and the inability to prolong out-door gatherings, necessitating the resumption of the above for providing rational teaching for the masses, imposes on the Council the duty of making arrangements for carrying them out in a suitable manner; and for the purpose of assisting them in considering how best to attain this end, a special meeting will be held on Tuesday, the 13th instant, at the Westminster Palace Hotel, to which the attention and coöperation of subscribers, members, and friends of the movement is earnestly invited. Hitherto the arduous task of establishing these Sunday Evening Services has been pursued under most disadvantageous circumstances, and, doubtless, sins, both of omission and commission, have been committed, but as, despite these almost unavoidable drawbacks to a difficult undertaking, a gratifying measure of success was nevertheless achieved in past seasons, little apprehension need be felt for the continued progress in public estimation of so good a cause, if there be forthcoming from all who are desirous of promoting it a corresponding amount of activity and determination to ensure this desideratum. In his address reproduced in the Advocate last month, Professor Huxley assumed that "Priestley was of opinion that before he was a man of science, he was a man in the first place, and a citizen in the second;" and the distinguished Professor confessed to sympathizing with Priestley in this view, for he said he held the duties of his manhood and the duties of his citizenship to be vastly superior to those of his philosophership, and added that he thought that "securing that freedom which was the essential condition of the progress of the human race was a vastly more important matter than advancing knowledge in this direction or that direction, vast as was the process itself; for it must be recollected that the men who combatted prejudices, the men who led their fellows to think for themselves, if they were not winning palpable victories for truth were organizing those victories." In delivering the inaugural lecture at the Sunday Evenings for the People in 1866, Professor Huxley laid the foundation of such an organization, and to him and the eminent men who acted with him, a numerous section of the community owned its indebtedness for the means of satisfying spiritual wants not adequately provided for elsewhere, by eagerly flocking to hear their discourses. The spirit of persecution, embodied in Sabbatarianism succeeded, as in Priestley's time, in suppressing those eloquent utterances, but happily for mankind it could not suppress the moral courage they had aroused, and which, later on, led to the sanction of the law of the land being appealed to on behalf of religious liberty, and to prevent the arrest of the free thought of the age—from being sacrificed to the ignorance and prejudice of those who were incapable of understanding its significance, or its importance to human well-being. Two years ago it was said by Dean Stanley, from the pulpit of Westminster Abbey, that Socrates "displayed what was the wisest virtue; viz., that of keeping his own conscience and independence to himself, and that he held his own against a mob, and against individual tyrants; showing that the man who was determined to hold his own could hold it if he liked." Of this persuasion were those who made one more effort for freedom in the Court of Common Pleas, and the result justified their anticipations and assured their legal position; for by the verdict delivered there, the right of holding these Sunday Evening Services, and that of their promoters choosing their own form of worship, was conceded. This consists in supplying the requirements of their nature, mental and emotional, by discourses on the world, around and within, on the revelations of the past, the realities of the present, and the possibilities of the future, accompanied by such sublime musical compositions as the purest emotions have inspired; and the only influence both can have will be to evoke the deepest thoughts of their hearers, and to fan the flame of aspiration for higher standards of living. Whatever may be considered the shortcomings of this ideal, or the methods employed for its realization, it should, nevertheless, commend itself to both men and women who are really anxious for social growth and wishful to see lessened that brutality which existing agencies have failed to remedy, and against which the press has lately so loudly raised its voice. Despite the verdict gained, proprietors of buildings with suitable halls have been so afraid of granting them for these Sunday Evening Services that there would appear to be no alternative save in making the most strenuous exertions to secure premises which would render all further difficulty of this kind impossible in future. Unmistakable signs are visible of the awakening of a more tolerant spirit among some whose attitude was formerly antagonistic, and moreover indications inducing a hopeful faith that the objects aimed at are being better understood and appreciated are not wanting. It is to be hoped that in the interests of the common weal liberal thinkers will practically endorse the sentiments uttered by Professor Huxley, by holding it to be the highest duty of their manhood and their citizenship to earnestly endeavor to sustain those who have striven and are still striving to secure that freedom which, as he truly says, is the essential condition of the progress of the human race.

NEWTON AND THE LAW OF GRAVITATION CHALLENGED.

[Our correspondent, as will be seen, rejects, what everybody is supposed to accept, the theory of gravitation. Such a man ought to be a very bold one, but he is a plain Baptist minister, and he is right down in earnest about it, too, and expects to convince the world, sooner or later, that he is right. Of course, the apple will still fall to the ground, but according to our correspondent's thinking, it will have to justify its fall on other grounds than Newton asserted.—Ed. Watchman and Reflector.]

Investigations of facts of Nature have led me to the conclusion that the discovery of the cause of "the motions of the celestial bodies and of our sea" was not made by Sir Isaac Newton. The accepted hypothesis of universal gravitation is not sustained by facts of Nature, but is a mental illusion, and is proved to be so, in that the proportion of solar attraction directed to the earth is less than the accepted lunar attraction on the earth. This forcible truth is fatal to Newton's "System of the World." Opening the way a little, I have selected for an example and a test of Newton's failure his regress of the earth's nodes, or the so-called precession of the equinoxes, which involves the absurdity of the earth rotating simultaneously on two axes inclined to each other about twenty-three degrees twenty-eight minutes. The diurnal rotation restrains the earth from rotating on a second axis, which second axis, perpendicular to the plane of the ecliptic, Newton invented, and around it he assumed that the earth completes a rotation in the time of twenty-five thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight years, as a result of solar attraction. Hence the precession of the equinoxes. But because it is physically impossible for the earth to rotate on this second axis, and because in Nature the earth does not so rotate, the mental illusion of solar attraction is proved. The earth is a spheroid, and in consequence of Nature's law of circular and curvilinear motions, it preserves the perpetual parallelism of its axis the same as would a homogeneous and perfect sphere, its axis not turned aside by external attraction, and therefore the forces, appearances, and facts of Nature conspire to preserve the invariability of the equinoctial points. This grand testimony of Nature is the invincible argument on which I rely to demonstrate to mankind: That the hypothesis of universal gravitation, like the Ptolemaic notion of an immovable earth, was merely a mental illusion. All the calculations founded on the hypothesis of gravitation agree with the hypothesis, but the hypothesis is unnatural, and therefore from it true deductions of natural science are impossible, and all philosophers and diviners who reject the teachings of the prophet Moses, and prefer the teachings of Newton, may learn as I have by the study of natural things, that it was not Moses, the prophet, but Sir Isaac Newton, the world-famed philosopher, who failed to enter into the communion of the facts of Nature. Yours in the glory of natural science,

WILLIAM ISAAC LOOMIS.

THE BONN CONFERENCE.

The propositions agreed to by the Conference at Bonn between the Old Catholics, the Greeks, and the Anglicans, with a view to union between the several bodies, are as follows:—

"We agree: I. That the apocryphal or deutero-canonical books of the Old Testament are not of the same canonicity with the books contained in the Hebrew canon.

"II. That no translation of Holy Scripture can claim an authority superior to that of the original text.

"III. That the reading of the Holy Scriptures in the vulgar tongue may not lawfully be forbidden.

"IV. That in general it is more fitting and in accordance with the spirit of the Church that the Liturgy should be in the tongue understood by the people.

"V. That faith, working by love, not faith without love, is the means and condition of man's justification before God.

"VI. That salvation cannot be merited by 'merit of condignity,' because there is no proportion between the infinite good of the salvation promised by God and the finite worth of man's works.

"VII. That the doctrines of 'opera supererogationis' and of a 'thesaurus meritorum sanctorum'—i. e., that the overflowing merits of the saints can be transferred to others, either by the rulers of the Church or by the authors of the good works themselves—are untenable.

"VIII. That (a) the number of the sacraments was fixed at seven first in the twelfth century, and then was received into the general teaching of the Church, not as a tradition coming down from the apostles or from the earliest times, but as the result of theological speculation. (b) Catholic theologians acknowledge, and we acknowledge with them, that baptism and the Holy Eucharist are 'principalia, præcipua, eximia salutis nostræ sacramenta.'

"IX. The Holy Scriptures being recognized as the primary rule of the faith, we agree that genuine tradition—i.e., the unbroken transmission, partly oral and partly by writing, of the doctrine delivered by Jesus Christ and the Apostles—is an authoritative source of teaching for all successive generations. This tradition is partly to be found in the consensus of the great ecclesiastical bodies standing in historical continuity with the primitive Church, partly to be gathered by a scientific method from the written documents of all centuries.

"X. We reject the new Roman doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin as being contrary to the tradition of the first thirteen centuries, according to which Christ alone is conceived without sin.

"XI. We agree that the practice of the confession of sins to a congregation or to a priest has come down to us from the Primitive Church, and that, purged from abuses and freed from constraint, it should be preserved in the Church.

"XII. We agree that indulgences can only refer to penalties actually imposed by the Church herself."

There was a long discussion over the following proposition, which was finally in substance adopted:—

"We agree that the way in which the words 'filioque' were inserted into the Nicene Creed was illegal, and that, with a view to future peace and unity, it is much to be desired that the whole Church should seriously set itself to consider whether the Creed could possibly be restored to its primitive form without sacrifice of any true doctrine expressed in the present Western form."

A resolution recognizing the validity of Anglican orders the members of the Greek Church declined to accept; and another resolution affirming that the invocation of saints is not commanded as a duty was also rejected by them.—Independent.

OPEN SECRET.

Not through Nature shineth
Godhead fair and free:
'Tis the Heart divineth
What the god must be.

Nature all concealing,
Dim her outer light,
Finite forms revealing,
Not the infinite.

All the godhead's planning
Not with striving learn—
Inner eye—Heart scanning—
Sees the god-bush burn.

THE INDEX will be sent to any name not now on our mail-list until January 1, 1876, on receipt of $3.00 in advance. Here is a chance to receive the paper for fourteen months at the price of twelve months. Please tell your friends and neighbors of this liberal offer, and help us to increase our circulation.

IN MR. LESUEUR'S thoughtful article on "Theology in Education," published in THE INDEX of week before last, the name Singlin was printed Ainglin, and the name Daunou was printed Daunow. For the sake of correct references it seems proper to make an exception in this instance to our rule excluding errata.

THE LEADING paper of this week's INDEX is an official document, published by the State of Massachusetts, and showing just where the question of church taxation was left by the last Legislature. The Commissioners appointed under the "Resolve" were Thomas Hills, Esq., of Boston, Professor Julius H. Seelye, of Amherst College, and James M. Barker, Esq., of Pittsfield, who are to report early to the next Legislature.

A FRIEND hands us this for publication; of course we should not venture to publish it except on request! "A patron of a certain newspaper once said to the publisher: 'Mr. Printer, how is it you have never called on me for pay for your paper?' 'O,' said the man of types, 'we never ask a gentleman for money.' 'Indeed,' replied the patron, 'how do you manage to get along when they don't pay?' 'Why,' said the editor, 'after a certain time we conclude that he is not a gentleman and we ask him.' 'Oh—ah—yes—I see; Mr. Editor, please give me a receipt,' and hands him a V. 'Make my name all right on your books.'"

WHEN WE ARGUE that the Free Religious Association, by being pledged to unlimited freedom of thought, is thereby pledged against Christianity, we would by no means be understood to argue that all its members are individually anti-Christians. This is not true. In fact, very few of them are anti-Christians. We profoundly respect the right of each member to define and determine his individual position as he thinks right; and all we mean is to affirm, from our own point of view, the actual impossibility of being Christian and free at the same time. That this impossibility will by-and-by be recognized by all, we have no doubt; but meantime the Free Religious Association is composed of some who recognize it and more who do not.

OPINIONS SEEM to differ as to the justice of our late criticisms of Spencer. By way of contrast to Mr. Connor's, the following may be quoted under the circumstances from a private letter: "Your remarks on Herbert Spencer and his Unknowable please me more than anything I have seen for a long time. That 'Unknowable' is just about one of the greatest frauds and shams of the present day, and whoever exposes its ridiculous pretensions renders a valuable service to philosophy and to the world." Even stronger approval was kindly expressed by Mr. William T. Harris, editor of the St. Louis Journal of Speculative Philosophy—a scholar whose coincidence of opinion is especially gratifying; but we are not at liberty to quote from his letter. Mr. Connor's defence of Spencer, however, is entitled to the most respectful attention, and we doubt not will be echoed by many among our readers. Let the truth win!

"SPENCER AND TYNDALL."

An article with the above heading, by our highly esteemed comrade Mr. Connor, is published on another page of our present issue. Its appearance has been unavoidably delayed, in order that we might add the word of comment which here accompanies it.

1. Mr. Connor thinks we failed in personal respect to Mr. Spencer and Professor Tyndall, because in reference to the doctrine of "the Unknowable" we used such expressions as "empty gibberish," "meaningless jargon," etc. Taken out of their proper connection, these phrases may seem unduly severe; but that they were personally disrespectful to Spencer or Tyndall, does not seem to us true. We must insist, on general radical principles, that a total separation ought to be made between the thinker and his thought; that the thinker should be treated with such respect as his personal character entitles him to, wholly irrespective of all other considerations; but that his thought should be weighed in absolute disregard of his personality, and treated with such respect only as it is entitled to by its intrinsic truth. A false or foolish notion broached by a writer of high reputation should receive no more deference than if propounded by one who is obscure and unfriended; and it is no personal disrespect whatever to any man to treat his opinions, thus totally detached from his personality, with the utmost freedom and frankness. We believe that Mr. Connor's censure is based on a certain half-defined notion that it is personal disrespect to a thinker to criticise his thought in this impersonal way,—that even the errors or absurdities of men who ordinarily are wise and great ought to be handled with exceptional tenderness and deference. We habitually write on a contrary principle: we hold that an error or absurdity should receive precisely the same treatment whether propounded by a philosopher or a fool, because error is error, and absurdity is absurdity, no matter who falls into it. When, therefore, we used the expressions complained of with reference to a certain fashionable doctrine which happened to be advocated by Spencer and Tyndall, we conceive that we were guilty of no personal disrespect whatever to these distinguished men. The respect we owe them personally we have always shown; but we cannot consent to be muzzled in a question of pure truth by any assumed immunity from severe criticism in what they may have happened to advance. In the world of ideas, all property rights absolutely lapse; and it is a weakness for any man to be offended, if ideas he has put forth receive exactly such treatment as their inherent value entitles them to. Inasmuch as we practise what we here preach, and never take umbrage at any sincere criticism of our thought provided the laws of personal courtesy are respected (and, we may add, not often even if they are not), we feel no contrition over the sins pointed out by Mr. Connor.

2. Mr. Connor's estimate of the philosophical value of Herbert Spencer's work is not identical with that which we have expressed at length in the North American Review and elsewhere. Believing that the ground-principles and building-plan of his philosophy are irremediably faulty, we cannot overlook these fundamental defects on account of the innumerable minor excellences with which his works abound. We consider his reputation as one which will not permanently remain what it is to-day, notwithstanding the immense worth of much that he has accomplished. Compared with such minds as Spinoza, Kant, and Hegel, Spencer cannot be ranked by any competent critic in the first order of philosophic genius; although he has done admirable work of a lower kind, which will be long remembered with grateful appreciation. Whoever is able to detect the flimsiness of those portions of the philosophy of Dr. Mansel and Sir William Hamilton which Spencer unquestioningly accepts and incorporates into his First Principles as essential to his own philosophy, will see that his statue of gold has feet of clay. It is the fashion to-day to follow Spencer; but we cannot follow him, or regard his philosophy as either profound, comprehensive, or satisfactory. He is simply the head of a transitory school, and a revolution in philosophy is actually beginning to take place which he is quite incapable of comprehending.

3. The doctrine of "the Unknowable," it is true, "does not affect the essential principles of Evolution;" but it does affect the essential principles of Spencerism, so far as Spencerism is to have any place at all in the history of philosophy. Spencer himself makes it a fundamental part of his First Principles; and if it is a mistaken doctrine, little enough will be left of his architectural plan. It is, however, a doctrine borrowed in substance directly from Sir William Hamilton, and is only dressed up in a little different phraseology; there is no originality about it. It has already been, not "modified" perhaps, but rejected totally, by every thinker who reluctantly against running his head into a mud-bank for the purpose of seeing the world to the best possible advantage.

4. The reply which Mr. Spencer, in 1869, attempted to make to our review of his Principles of Biology was, in our judgment, so eminently unsuccessful, inadequate, and lame, that we cannot honestly admit the force of Mr. Connor's quaint suggestion that our views of Spencer's philosophy are affected unfavorably by a remembered drubbing at his hands! If there was any drubbing on that occasion, it is our impression that it was in the opposite direction: an impression that will remain unweakened until Mr. Spencer better appreciates the force of the objections he then tried without success to answer.

5. Mr. Connor has not quite understood us, if he supposes that we at all object to Professor Tyndall's discernment in matter of "the promise and potency of all terrestrial life." One part of our critique of Spencer's Principles of Biology, in 1868, was a defence of the doctrine of "spontaneous generation," or the origination of life out of inorganic matter. We should rather object to Tyndall's hesitation and vagueness of statement in laying down a principle which we unqualifiedly accept. That all organic life is a gradual evolution of inorganic matter is a conclusion implied in the very idea of Evolution. But what is this "inorganic matter" which is the admitted source of all organic life? This is the main question; and a correct definition of matter is, after all, the objective point of all philosophizing on this subject. At present, Professor Tyndall seems to halt in the notion of self-subsistent (we cannot yield that word), substantial atoms endowed with inherent polar forces; and these polar or "structural" forces he seems to regard as the ultimate cause of all organic life, so far as thought can go. But thought insists on going farther. Inherent properties of mutually independent atoms, manifesting themselves under laws which govern permanently all their various interactions, present a new difficulty as great as that of supposing that the universe results from the "fortuitous concourse" of the atoms. How happens it that the inherent forces of all these infinitely numerous atoms, each of which is conceived to be self-subsistent (for Tyndall drops not the slightest intimation that the atoms depend either on each other or on anything else), should obey any general laws at all? This conformity of all atomic and molecular action to one and the same law of "polarity," by which alone organic forms are conceived to be evolved, points directly to some deep identity of the atoms with each other, and in fact seems to reduce them to mere manifestations, under fixed temporal and extensional conditions, of one omnipresent Energy; and here must be sought the real secret of all organism. By this very conception of atoms with inherent properties which manifest themselves only under a universal law of polarity, we are led directly away from what we designated in "The God of Science" as the "polytheism of science," and are taught to embrace a vaster conception, which reconciles the Many with the One. The notion of matter itself melts into that of unconditioned, yet all-conditioning force—an idea as near that of omnipresent "spirit" as can well be entertained. Materialism itself, by being rigorously followed out, loses its original character; the definition of matter adapts itself to the requirements of philosophic unity; and thought is led to the idea of One Reality, not absolutely "inscrutable" by any means, but known to the exact extent that the universe and its laws are known.

This seems to us the final outcome of Tyndall's "materialism." So far from quarrelling with it, we have no quarrel but with the failure to announce it unambiguously and to extend it without limitation even to "sensation and thought." True it is, as Tyndall confesses, that science cannot to-day intelligibly connect molecular motion with phenomenal consciousness; but "by an intellectual necessity" we "cross the boundary of the experimental evidence," and are willing to concede that this connection will eventually be established beyond a doubt. What follows? Not that matter is all—far from it. But that the one omnipresent Energy which manifests itself in countless atoms as a universal organic "polarity" manifests itself also in the atom-built organism as "intelligence": in a word, that matter and mind are one—Janus-faces of the All, twin caryatids of an outer porch of the great temple of Being, whose adytum still waits to be revealed. Neither can mind be reduced to matter, nor matter to mind; the logical leadings of Tyndall's peculiar "scientific materialism," which not only postulates an infinity of mutually independent atoms but also a strictly universal law of "polarity" that governs them, are manifestly away from that genuine form of "materialism" which explains everything by matter alone, and suggest monism as a better name than materialism for the philosophy to which modern science is conducting us. "Mystery" enough there is, yet not "insoluble;" and the indomitable mind of man, refusing voluntarily to clip the wings that bear it forever onward and upward, urges its flight towards regions that seem to the timid hopelessly beyond its reach. Be of good courage, O marvellous Intellect, for thou too art of the essence of the eternal!

6. Mr. Connor tries to distinguish between "the manifestation of a Power which does not manifest itself" and "the manifestation of a Power which does manifest itself." Such a distinction, with the utmost deference to our friend, we must hold to be a self-evident contradiction. Of "a Power which does not manifest itself," it is astonishing to suppose that we can have any "manifestation." The manifestation of something else is not the manifestation of that Power. One of two things must be true: either we have no manifestation of that Power, or else it must manifest itself. Mr. Spencer and his followers may argue till doomsday, but they must accept one of these two alternatives. Our knowledge of the Ultimate Reality is exactly equal to the extent of its manifestations; and to style it "the Unknowable" is to affirm and deny knowledge in the same breath. We are disposed to be infinitely accommodating; but we must not be expected to repeal the laws of thought in order to suit Mr. Spencer's special convenience.

7. By restricting religion to sentiment and emotion, while at the same time giving over to science the entire realm of knowledge and thought, Professor Tyndall does make an unfortunate "divorce between science and religion." Certainly we cherish a very different conception of their mutual relation. To us, religion includes the fullest possible development of thought, emotion, will, conscience, and whatever other elements may be found to exist in human nature; in other words, science is simply a part of religion, as being the development of the purely intellectual part of human nature. Why institute an opposition or rigorous demarcation between the part and its whole? It is our very earnest aim to show that religion demands the symmetry and fulness of a complete development, in harmonious and due proportion, of all the elements of our being; and we regret the perpetuation of confusion on this all-important point. Religion is to-day falling into well-bred or ill-bred contempt just because it is given over to sentimentalists as their especial charge; and it will be impossible to preserve much respect for it under such guardianship. The masculine elements of intellect and will, quite as much as the feminine elements of love and reverence (and all these are needed in every well-rounded character), must enter into all such religion as has any inheritance in the future. In vain is it hoped that religion can feed exclusively on the Barmecide diet of veneration for a "mystery," whether soluble or insoluble; the world must know what it is to venerate, or it will stop venerating altogether. Let us learn a little wisdom from the man who tried to teach his horse to live without eating, and who lamented that, when he had reduced him to a regimen of one straw a day, the experiment was brought to a premature close by the poor beast's going to—well, let us hope, to grass! With all the beauty and inspiration of his famous address, Professor Tyndall has not given us such a conception of religion as will redeem it from the limbo of obsolescence; and we think that nothing is more wanted to-day than an idea which shall gather up into one grand synthesis all the elements that go to the making of a full, fine, and perfected humanity. If a better word than religion can be found, well and good; we care little for the word alone. But this idea, with some fitting word to express it, is what myriads are blindly struggling towards; and it is this, the name and the thing, that we hope to serve to-day.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL'S ADDRESS.

The readers of THE INDEX will doubtless thank us for calling their attention to the latest and best edition of Prof. Tyndall's recent Address before the British Association. This edition is the one authorized by Prof. Tyndall himself, and contains, not only a preface from his pen, but portions of the Address as originally written, which no previous editions have embodied. This edition is now for sale at THE INDEX office, at the price of thirty cents. A. W. S.

ABOUT "FEELING BIG."

Mr. Morse sends this little note in response to a "Glimpse" of last week:

DEAR ABBOT:—

If you "feel big," your mind can't be "infinite." Sorry! So palpable a fact o'erthrows philosophy.

Disappointedly yours, MORSE.

P. S. Or must there needs be an exception to prove the rule? I believe. M.

If "feeling big" last week over Mr. Morse's announcement that "every mind is infinite" proves that our mind cannot be infinite, he sets us all right this week by making us "feel small." Now we are infinite, surely!

MR. KELSEY'S SOUTH-SIDE VIEW.

In the last number of THE INDEX, Mr. Kelsey, of St. Louis, asks the question, "Have white men born in the Southern States no civil rights that their Northern brethren are willing to respect?"

Mr. Kelsey will find our reply in the text of Mr. Sumner's Civil Rights Bill, the substance of which has already been printed in these columns. A man so well informed as Mr. Kelsey claims to be does not need to be told that this bill aims to secure the rights of all classes without regard to race or color.

Mr. Kelsey seems to think that between the "Africans and Anglo-Saxons" in the South there is "constantly increasing jealousy, enmity, and antagonism;" and that in "the inevitable and impending conflict" the white race must go to the wall. He argues that the negroes are abundantly able to take care of themselves, and that the whites are not. He asserts with apparent seriousness that "the blacks are working together in perfect unison" to "extirpate the whites from among them." If Mr. Kelsey's theory is as correct as his observations are original, we submit that, for the protection of the doomed and incapable white race, the passage of the Civil Rights Bill is an imperative necessity.

An extended review of Mr. Kelsey's statements and theories would involve more space and time than we think they deserve; often contradictory, they answer each other, while the extravagance and exaggeration of the writer is so obvious as to render comment superfluous. If, however, any readers of THE INDEX are tempted to accept his estimate of the capabilities and desires of the black race, and his representation of the condition of the South, as just, we ask their attention to the statement of Mr. Thomas W. Conway, late Superintendent of Education in Louisiana, published in another column. Mr. Kelsey himself might learn something from Mr. Conway; and if he cares to pursue his investigation, we recommend the old files of the Nation, whose present advocacy of class rule he is so ready to justify. A CONFESSION.

In defining another's position one defines his own, and all the more sincerely because unconsciously. In its issue of September 26, the Christian Register did this so excellently well that no apology is needed for referring to it, though the paper is so far out of date. We forgive easily the misstatements; as, for instance, that the Free Religious Association meets but once a year,—that THE INDEX is its organ,—for the sake of the entire candor with which its notions of religion and of Christianity are confessed. It cannot be pretended by any person of ordinary intelligence, who has bestowed half a thought on the matter, that the Free Religious men have concealed their objects, or have cloaked their opinions in coverings of ambiguous words. They have said, till saying has made the statement threadbare, that their design, their prime and sole design, was to emancipate religion from sectarian bonds, to effect something towards the reconciliation of faiths, and to introduce the scientific method into the study of the moral and spiritual universe in place of the theological. This aim they have held in view to the exclusion of every other, keeping themselves clear from all entanglements, committing themselves to no words or actions that might render their position doubtful, and bringing forward, in every aspect, their cardinal idea. All this the Register knows as well as Mr. Potter, or Mr. Abbot. To suppose the Register ignorant of so plain a fact would be equivalent to supposing it idiotic. There is every reason why it should be fully informed on the subject; there is not a single shadow of a reason why it should be uninformed or misinformed. Knowing thus much, whatever else it may not know (and we frankly concede its manifest ignorance on some points), but knowing thus much, the Register declares that the Free Religious Association is "not engaged in any religious or humane work," and that Free Religionists, as a body, "are anti-Unitarian and anti-Christian." Which is as much as saying that, in the judgment of the Register, neither religion nor humanity are concerned in the emancipation of religion from sectarian bonds, in the reconciliation of faiths, or in the substitution of the scientific method for the theological in the study of the moral and spiritual universe; that it believes in the sectarian policy and principle, approves of the polemical relations that the great religions of the world sustain to one another, and have sustained for ages, and clings to the ancient method of consulting authoritative tradition instead of facts, in order to ascertain the truth in regard to Divine existence and human destiny. A most noteworthy admission, which would never be made directly; which could not be extracted by any polemical exigency; which, when suggested in the form of an accusation, has been repudiated again and again; but which unawares comes out as an inevitable inference from its issue with Free Religion.

As if this general avowal were not sufficient, the Register makes it explicit by declaring the Free Religionists as a body "anti-Unitarian and anti-Christian." We are to understand, then, that Unitarianism is pledged to maintain the sectarian spirit, is committed to the course of encouraging the hostility of religions, and holds to the theological method of treating questions of religious belief. We are to assume that Christianity is justified in keeping jealously within its walls, in asserting its claim to a special revelation, in setting up its absolute supremacy over Buddhism, Theism, and all other religions under the sun, and in clinging to its traditional dogmas in defiance of reason and knowledge. This is precisely what we have suspected, and, in vindication of our position, have charged. So far as the Register is concerned, our suspicions are warranted, our charge is made good. The action of the Conference at Saratoga proved that the Unitarian clergy and laity, as a body, were of the same mind earnestly and all but unanimously. Why then further agitate so plain a matter? We are grateful to the Register for putting a disputed point to rest so completely and in so guileless a way. The idle words go to judgment, because they are the unguarded overflow of the heart. Free Religionists and others will please take notice.

SELFHOOD NOT SELFISHNESS.

In the effort to accomplish the perfect life, perhaps there is no one task more difficult than to discriminate rightly between the duty which we owe to ourselves and that which we owe to others. Unless this discrimination be justly made, either our own individuality suffers, or that contribution which we are bound to make to the happiness of our fellows is stinted.

In the first place, we have ourselves. The first and the best gift which Nature makes to man is himself. And the first as well as the last and best return which Nature expects man to make to her is that of himself,—his ripened, matured, and perfected self. Nature deals with man just as she does with the apple, the berry, the corn in the field: she gives the germ, the seed, and then expects the full-grown fruit as a recompense. The first duty, then, which a man owes, is to himself,—since himself improved upon is the debt which he has to pay back to the universe. He has nothing at all to bestow on anybody else until he first has accumulated something in his own being. A beggar only is he until he has acquired something to give. Physically, intellectually, and spiritually, man's first concern is necessarily for himself. He must grow, ripen, and mature. His nature must become full of richness, sweetness, strength, and beauty. Self-culture is his duty and his privilege. To make the most of himself is his highest possible art. To render his being full-orbed is his completest attainment. Otherwise he cheats Nature; otherwise he defrauds the world. If a fig-tree does not bear fruit, it deserves cursing. If the individual does not enlarge and enrich his nature with all possible fulness and opulence, he invites the reproach of God and the contempt of men.

There are too many men and women who misapprehend the just rights and claims of selfhood; who depreciate that primary regard which Nature expects them to have for themselves. They are well-meaning people; in motive and intention they are good people. They are, indeed, those who are called benevolent, generous, self-sacrificing people. But they labor under a mistake as to what real goodness, real benevolence, real generosity is. They undertake to give themselves away before they have fairly come into possession of themselves. They think to benefit others by bestowing those things which, in themselves, convey the most superficial blessing, and enrich with the most transient enriching. Ordinary benevolence consists in the giving of mere externalities,—money, food, clothing, books, pictures, furniture, personal civility, entertainment of houses and grounds. But what we ought to be able to give is, not externalities alone, but internalities. First and last and all the time, we ought to be able to give ourselves; and unless the externalities which we bestow contain the very finest flavor of our essential personality, all our bestowing of them will impart comparatively but little benefit to the receivers. If I am thirsty, I desire to drink from a well which is cool and deep, which is fed with never-failing springs from the heart of everlasting hills,—for this gives me an honest promise of supplying my returning want, again and again; and only the direst necessity will make me content to lap a little from a shallow stream which the next hour's sun may suck up into the air. So, if I want real benefits from a fellow man, I will go, not to that one who is richest in purse, but to him who is richest in mind and heart; whose character is bottomed on eternities, and fed by perennial powers.

The truest benevolence does not impoverish the giver in enriching the receiver. To him who hath shall more be given; from him only who hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath. There are multitudes of people who are actually squandering their natures in trying to be good and kind to others; whose individualities literally are being ground to powder under a mistaken sense of duty. It is truly pathetic to stand by while this is transpiring; for, though one cannot but admire the motive that prompts to it, one must as inevitably deplore the result. Goodness ought not to be a matter of conscience only, but the outcome of inspiration as well. When it is the former alone, it is not only juiceless, unrelishing, and unlovely, but it is absolutely killing,—as the letter without the spirit always is. Equally true is it that, when duty is a yoke and not a joy, it galls and frets and eats into the neck of the wearer.

Goodness should be joyfulness, and duty should be beauty. And this must be so in every case where the duty which we owe to ourselves is rightly balanced with that which we owe to others. The world has no right, the universe itself has no right, to demand of me that I sacrifice myself for it, unless my own individuality consents and bounds with elastic feet to the immolation. It is one of the highest rights which I as an individual possess, to sacrifice myself for others when the mood of generosity is upon me, or when the grand passion for humanity rises strong in my soul and sweeps me on to its high destiny. There is no selfishness in true selfhood. The man who wisely loves himself, he as truly loves his fellow men. He who thinks so highly of his personality as not to be willing to convert it into a soup-house to feed chronic greed and indolence, or into a gibbet on which to hang daily sacrifices for those who would be better off to depend more upon themselves, he is quite as likely as others to remember to be merciful to the really suffering, kind and generous to the really needy, and patient and gentle with the wayward and erring.

One said to me once: "I think Goethe was the wisest man I ever knew or heard of. He just got the good times himself, let it cost what it might to others. Then, by making his own nature rich, others—the world, anybody—who came in contact with him received the blessing." I do not endorse this opinion; it is too unguarded and undiscriminating. In my eyes, Goethe is not "the wisest man." He preached the gospel of self-culture, and for that I thank him; he certainly did make "his own nature rich," and many others have thus received a blessing from him, as doubtless many more will in many years to come. For all this I admire him. But just because he was too willing to get "the good times himself, let it cost what it might to others," and so mingled selfishness with his selfhood, I cannot hold him up as an unspotted model. Ralph Waldo Emerson comes nearer the mark than did Johann Wolfgang Goethe. The latter preached the gospel of self-culture; the former preaches the gospel of character. This is better. Mr. Emerson teaches us that we more truly bless others by what we are than by what we do. Yet he himself is an example of a humane and noble life, as well as of a rich and cultured nature. What we need to learn is to attain and maintain a nice balance between what we owe to others and what we owe to ourselves; to cultivate a true selfhood without lapsing into selfishness; to practise a real benevolence without suffering a dissipation of our personality.

"FAITHFUL ARE THE WOUNDS OF A FRIEND."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Two things in your issue of October 15 rather pained me. One was your saying that you supposed there was "no prospect of redress" for a "gross misrepresentation" of your position on the part of Professor F. W. Newman; the other was your reply to Colonel Higginson on the subject of the Woman's Journal.

As regards the first point, it is certainly very discouraging to those who look to THE INDEX and its friends for an exemplification of all that is best in morality and in temper, to find that you have no hope of obtaining amends for a "gross misrepresentation" by one of your own editorial contributors. Is this the result, we may ask, of "Liberty and Light"? What, then, are the effects of bondage and darkness?

With regard to the second point, I can only say that your original remark with reference to the Woman's Journal impressed me with the idea that it was a feebly conducted sheet, only redeemed from insipidity by Colonel Higginson's contributions. If this was a compliment, as you now insist, compliments cannot always be pleasant to receive.

Yours very sincerely,

WM. D. LE S.

OTTAWA, 21 October, 1874.

[Explanation on these two points is very properly asked.

1. The reason we saw "no prospect of redress" was not that we doubted in the least Professor Newman's willingness to correct his perfectly honest though grievous misrepresentation, but partly that we doubted whether Fraser's Magazine would insert a correction, and partly that we should consider a correction, even if inserted, as a very inadequate remedy for the false impression now given. We are exceedingly sorry that we unintentionally seemed to disparage Professor Newman's fairness or magnanimity, and hasten to disavow a construction of our ill-considered phrase which would be shamefully unjust to one whom we respect in the highest degree.

2. The "sneer" at the Woman's Journal was incidental only; a deserved compliment to Colonel Higginson was what our phrase was intended to convey; and our remark above criticised was simply designed to put the emphasis where it belonged. We thought that Colonel Higginson's excessive modesty led him to distort our meaning, and thereby (of course unintentionally) to misrepresent it. If a little boy with a smutch on his face approached, we should not say, "Here comes a smutch," but, "Here comes a little boy." There is a great deal in emphasis. Whether it is a "sneer" to call a journal "rather dull," opinions may differ; but we intended no sneer. We are sorry now that we said what we did, but we cannot take it back honestly, for we think it still. The Woman's Journal advocates a righteous cause, and we wish it all success; and perhaps its dulness to us arises from the fact that we need no conversion to its idea. But THE INDEX gets a great deal harsher treatment without complaining, and we cannot help wondering that the Woman's Journal should be so sensitive at so mild a criticism.—ED.]

THE DUTY OF TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

RUSHFORD, Minn., October 7, 1874.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Friend,—The complete abandon of moral courage and self-forgetfulness (self-regardfulness you would call it) with which you follow your convictions, no matter what attitude you are led to assume, not only in the eyes of the world, but also of your nearest friends is—well, is what touches with enthusiasm my admiration for your character as revealed in THE INDEX. But while all your friends must honor and be proud of your courage, of course we must feel a proportionate anxiety that the convictions so bravely followed should be absolutely truthful, or as nearly so as possible; and you must not be surprised if, upon occasion, numbers of us rush in upon you with hurried warnings and eager offers to correct your "reckonings."

I am one (of many I am sure) who, fully appreciating the courage with which you maintain the "sinner's part" in the great temperance tournament, still doubts your eye-piece a little and trembles lest you fall into one particular pit. Because there are so many points about this many-sided question which we (at least you and I) see precisely alike, and only one important one about which we radically differ; and because on this one point my perceptions are in accord with those of all the earnest, positive temperance (not to say temperate) men whom I have met.—I am of necessity inclined to suspect some slight flaw in the very excellent lenses through which you examine the subject. Your field-glass appears to be a good one, but is your microscope perfectly achromatic? Less metaphorically stated (Col. Higginson says metaphors are always dangerous!), your survey of the public relations of temperance is quite satisfactory to me; but I strongly question your notion of the nature of temperance itself. That temperance in respect to alcohol as a beverage can, at this day, mean to a man of "cultured free thought" anything else than total abstinence, is to me, indeed, quite astonishing. You will not, like Horace Greeley, appeal to the dictionary to settle a question in moral science—as if any philologist could fix and determine the meaning of terms in that field. What, then, is "temperance"?

Whether or not Judge Stallo has succeeded in demonstrating that "there is no physical constant" in the universe, we all know that none can be assumed in establishing the relation between lager-beer (e. .g) and the human stomach. To make the meaning of "temperance" depend upon that relation is to deprive it of all character which has any value in the conduct of life, not to mention before the law, where, as universal experience proves, such a meaning is utterly worthless. It is to take "temperance" entirely out of the moral sphere, where you and I and all men of religious faith (!) recognize at least one "constant"—to wit, the love of man,—and relegate it to the limbo of the "intelligent jury," and the hardly more determinate world of medical wisdom. To the juryman, "temperance" never did and never can mean anything, unless it comes to mean total abstinence; to the doctor or physiologist, it may possibly mean moderate drinking "for such as are capable of self-control"—though this is by no means so well established as to warrant your (somewhat naïve?) assumption. But to the moralist, knowing all we do to-day of alcohol and of the influence of fashion, example, etc., how can it mean anything at all save total abstinence?

The "Representative Mystic," Swedenborg, makes, as a leading doctrinal tenet of the "true Christian religion," this proposition: "That to do good and become regenerate man must avoid evils as sins against God." In criticism of this the representative Radical, Mr. Emerson, remarks somewhat superciliously, I think, that (I quote from memory) "he has not progressed far who needs to know more than that a thing is evil in order to avoid it." The abuse of alcohol as a beverage is an evil to the world of such magnitude that, if we are not quite justified in regarding it as the evil, we are almost. The abuse of it by the world is an inevitable consequence of its free use by individuals—in the present state of human development, at least. If the benefits derivable from its use by individuals are not wholly questionable, still the dangers attending general use are so almost infinitely great, in proportion to the certain benefits, that such use is, practically speaking, an unmitigated evil. Leaving out all the results of "microscopic research," etc., etc., as eminently unsatisfactory on either side, it seems to me that no man whose thought is really free can fail to see with the "naked eye" that any use of alcohol as a beverage, which is possible to the race, is in such conflict with the good of the race that to encourage it in any degree becomes an evil which we ought to avoid, either as a sin against the God of Free Religion, or because we have "progressed" far enough to avoid it as a simple evil.

But precisely because "temperance" is without practical meaning outside of morals or religion, I would, with you, maintain, as against the State, the right of every individual to eat and drink (and so, of course, to buy and sell) what and how much he chooses, becoming responsible to the State for damage to others only. At least I should regard it as inexpedient for the State to maintain the opposite. But, as against the claims of humanity, or of the moral law, I must maintain still more strenuously that no man has the right to so much as "look upon the wine when it is red."

And now is it possible that I, who read you with such loving and patient attention, am among those who do not sufficiently understand you to deserve your attention, and that you do not at all encourage the use of alcohol as a beverage? If so, I shall willingly suffer the necessary mortification of my "pride of intellect" for the sake of that gladness of heart which it will afford me to know it; for I am

Very truly your friend,

T. H. EVERTS.

[Who could resist the influence of such an appeal as this, though from one he had never met "in the flesh," or fail to respond to it with a profound wish to see things in the same light, if only truth to his own vision would permit? But nothing could possibly be gained by allowing sympathy to distort insight, or what seems to be such. The world needs absolute sincerity in this matter of temperance, and we must say what we inwardly believe, even at the cost of giving pain when we should so ardently wish to give "gladness of heart." As to those who fly to vituperation, we consider them not at all.

What is the really noblest attitude with regard to abstinence, so far as they are concerned who know they do not personally need to abstain "teetotally"? How far should consideration for "example" deflect their course from what seems best per se? Let each loyally answer this question for himself, as we mean to answer it now.

For years we have considered this matter; with no lurch to self-indulgence, for it would require an inappreciable self-sacrifice to abstain absolutely. This is our conclusion: to adopt and act upon that principle which seems best in itself, sure that in the long run no better "example" can be given to the world.

Make your own conduct the reflex of your innermost conviction, and trust that the total influence of your character shall in no other way be, on the whole, nobler or purer or more beneficent. It is our own innermost conviction that total abstinence is not a universal duty—that the strict government of self by ideal law is the highest possible "example"—that the "example" of him who is always and everywhere temperate can never be in favor of intemperance—that it is not particular acts, but the principles they express, that really constitute "example." If this is true (and radicalism is one huge lie if it be false), then he who gives up his own principle to adapt himself to the supposed needs of others fails to render them the highest service. Hence we cannot, with our views, live out the ideal of the teetotaller, which is not ours—cannot for the sake of any supposed "example" give a lesson of distrust of self-government by reason and conscience. Others will decide for themselves: we cannot conform to an ideal not our own.—ED.]

"THERE IS A WAY THAT SEEMETH RIGHT TO A MAN, BUT THE END THEREOF IS DEATH."

FRIEND ABBOT:—

In THE INDEX of October 15, I notice, under the head of "Glimpses," an item in which reference is made to what is called an able defence of the value of alcohol as a nutritive agent. It strikes me that a good deal of ability would be required to make the world believe that alcohol is food, as such an idea is at war with the instincts and common sense of mankind. Alcohol is a product of decomposition. It comes from a rotting process. In choosing food, man instinctively avoids any portion that is rotten or in a decaying state. In the very item referred to, we have recorded an illustration of the danger of introducing into the system any product of decay. Dr. Anstie, who made the defence of alcohol as food, died from the effects of a dissection wound. He had taken into his blood the poison of a decaying body.

Nathaniel Hawthorne, who was not a teetotaler, says, in his English Note Book: "Brewers' draymen are allowed to drink as much of their masters' beverage as they like, and they grow very brawny and corpulent, resembling their own horses in size, and presenting, one would suppose, perfect pictures of physical comfort and well being. But the least bruise, or even the hurt of a finger, is liable to turn to gangrene or erysipelas, and become fatal."

SETH HUNT.

[By "able defence" we did not mean demonstration. On a point concerning which the best scientific men differ so widely, we have no opinion of our own.—ED.]

THE RESERVE AND THE ADVANCE.

NEW YORK, Oct. 4, 1874.

EDITOR INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Your correspondent from Barre, Massachusetts, under date of September 4, in writing about the question of "Organization," shows a very earnest spirit, but fails, I think, to understand those who do not fully agree with her.

Pardon me if I do not answer "yes" to the call, when she speaks of "sleepy, easy-living, conciliatory, compromising radicals, who assure us there is no danger."

In a short newspaper article it is not possible to express fully one's views. May I call her attention to one sentence in a letter of mine in THE INDEX, September 3, dated Passaic, New Jersey? I quote: "Many live in a business world which taxes their full energies, and have work to do which seemingly takes their whole time." May I add now that, when a person assumes any duty, even though it be of a business nature, he should first answer its demands fully, honorably, before he assumes other duties? And at present may I still be permitted to be one of the reserve force, a necessary part of every army, while expressing myself quite willing to acknowledge your correspondent's privilege to join the advance guard?

I surely wish her every success possible; and she may rest content that, as written before, "when .... the roll-call is sounded, the response will be in no uncertain sounds."

We cannot all of us be leaders, and to each one is given now only the possibility to act the truth as the soul sees it. Very truly, A.

[It would be the extreme of fanaticism to assume to decide what is duty for others, especially in ignorance of individual circumstances. We have not infrequently spoken of the "public duty" which liberals as such owe to their country; that is, the duty of helping to secure a more thorough secularization of our government. But we always mean to recognize the entire propriety of each one deciding for himself how he can best aid in this work. The "reserve-force" is just as important as the "advance-guard;" and he certainly obeys orders from the headquarters of conscience who resolves first of all to discharge the immediate duty that devolves upon him. Only let us not forget our public relations in the stress of private demands upon us.—ED.]

HELP FOR WOMEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Will you allow me space in your paper to say to its readers that the office of "The Business Woman's Mutual Benefit Association" is now open, and to beg, in behalf of the cause which the society represents, the much needed interest and coöperation of the people of Boston?

This association was organized last February, and its management placed in the hands of a board of directors. It attracted much attention, won sympathy and practical help; but in consequence of the lateness of the season, few workers, etc., we failed to receive a sufficient number of honorary members to give us the full amount of money necessary, before we can receive the beneficiary members, whom the association proposes to aid.

It is not possible to give here the plan upon which the society is based, but those who receive circulars at the time of their distribution will recall details; those who failed to receive them can obtain them, and all other desired information upon the subject, by calling at the office of the society, 208 Tremont Street.

The object of this association is especially worthy of attention, for the reason that it is in no respect a charity, but simply proposes, under clearly-defined conditions, to help women who support themselves by their own industry to take care of themselves in the event of sickness or extreme need.

It is sincerely hoped that the present notice may result in so large an accession of honorary members that the sum still needed to make up the fund required before the purpose of the society can be achieved may be speedily obtained.

Those desiring to consult persons interested other than the writer are referred to Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, Mrs. James T. Fields, Rev. E. E. Hale, and Mrs. Caroline M. Severance. All moneys should be sent to the Treasurer, Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, 155 Boylston Street, Boston.

Respectfully, ALICE DUTTON BALLOU, Pres.

THE "P. S. OF A."

CINCINNATI, Oct. 11, 1844.

EDITOR OF INDEX:

Dear Sir,—It was with the utmost astonishment that I read in your paper the article headed "Patriotic Sons of America." How any one who, as a reader of your valuable INDEX, may at least be accredited with liberal ideas can defend or hold up such an organization to the gaze of an admiring public is more than I can understand. Well for him that, as he says, he is not a member, and that, "as far as he knows," they are on the side of liberty. On that account, and that only, he may be excused.

As a foreigner, I lift my voice to object to such societies, which teach a feeling of hatred towards all not "born Americans," and hold that the P. S. of A. should not be advertised in THE INDEX and commended by the silence of its editor.

Look at their record! In 1847 (I quote your correspondent), the P. S. of A. were first organized in Philadelphia, and now, after twenty-seven years of existence, number no more than twenty-six thousand members. Only twenty-six thousand who love their star-spangled banner as none others can! Is not that a direct proof that they are ignored by every intelligent mind of the country? Is it not a direct insult to recommend such "Know-Nothing" institutions, and to make people believe at this late day that the P. S. of A. are worthy of support? Cast them aside! You may as justly commend the "Society of Jesus," on the ground that, as they are laboring for the welfare of their sect regardless of means, they should be accordingly admired. Away, say I, with such selfish organizations, which no more belong to this century than the infidel-eaters of former days. It is a well-known fact that they exclude all who are not Protestants from membership. These very P. S. of A. forget it was as much the atheist and foreigner who saved the country during the late rebellion as it was themselves. Certain it is that they, the twenty-six thousand who choose to exclude foreigners and infidels from membership, and who love their country as none others can, could not have done it! I, as a Philadelphian of eight years' residence, know some of them. Who and what are they? They are in most cases men who, although fond of membership in a secret organization, do not actually understand the intents of that society; men who take not the time to inquire into its nature, and who only accept it because of its novelty of wearing badges, giving signs, etc. Leave Philadelphia, and hardly anybody knows anything about them; they are purely local, and instead of increasing grow daily less.

I hope that the above will be an eye-opener to a great many who might have been misled by the correspondent in your last.

Believe me, yours respectfully, H. B. G., of Philadelphia.

[It will not do to infer that our "silence" is "commendation." A great many things are said in THE INDEX that we totally dissent from; and it ought to be well understood by this time, as stated in our standing announcement, that "no writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except his or her own individual statements."

As to the "Patriotic Sons of America," we know too little of them as yet either to recommend or denounce that organization; but we do seriously object to the "Know-Nothing" feature of it, as also to its secret character. If it has any doctrinal test of membership, this is an insuperable objection; but we have no conclusive evidence that such is the case. Further information as to its real designs and operations will be very acceptable; and evidence favorable or unfavorable to the Order will be impartially published. There is no just ground of complaint against Dr. Whistler, who very kindly sent us for publication such facts as he could gather on the subject; for which he has our cordial thanks.—ED.]

CO-OPERATION VERSUS SPECULATION.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Your New York correspondent, "C. M.," takes exception to my friendly criticism of his former article. He has entirely overlooked the fact that I candidly admitted there were palpable errors connected with all labor reform, and hence his allusion to "trades unions' brutal interference with the inherent rights of labor" was quite unnecessary, for there is nothing that I have said which implies I have any sympathy with such movements.

So far from setting myself up as a teacher, I expressed an earnest wish to be taught more on the subject, and for this reason was sorry that "C. M.," in his first article, had failed to give me the light I sought.

For he has failed to make it clear to me that there is any such thing as "unfettered competition" under the present customs and systems which age has made respectable.

I made no call upon Church or State for aid or interference. This would be antagonistic to the idea expressed, that labor must work out its own salvation through the gradual attainment of a knowledge of the true laws of Nature, to distinguish between them and their counterfeit,—trusting too that the influences of a rational religion would soften the asperities of capital through its effect upon individual character.

There was nothing in my article to suggest the question, "Does he believe that it is injurious to humanity that those who do not labor and produce shall know want and suffering?" for "C. M." cannot think I would shield the lazy and improvident. I am Spencerian enough to believe "that men are best educated by being left to suffer the natural consequences of their actions." It was of quite another class I spoke: those who through incessant and crushing labor accumulated for other hands to use.

And how to use? Sometimes wisely, and to promote the true interests of all concerned, but too often for oppression, and to bind more firmly the shackles of the poor, thus ensuring their continued poverty. The latter, I am sure, would not be the course of "C. M." The very fact that he tries to bring the moral element into speculation shows that he has a heart and soul. But let me warn him that, if he thinks too much about morals when he is speculating, it will be fatal to all success. No such course did the old gentleman I referred to pursue. He did not "buy when abundance and cheapness prevailed, to sell when scarcity and dearness approached" in order to "supply the future wants of his fellow-beings." On the contrary he destroyed the harmony of distribution of certain commodities in several of our largest cities, by shipping to one point convenient to himself. Thus, buying and holding for the selfish control of himself and his confederates, he caused a dearth of the commodities needed at other points, destroying the natural distribution which a healthy trade, guided by intelligent coöperation, would have given. This was attending to "the wants of his fellow-beings" with a vengeance!

"C. M." asks if I would "have had him" (the old gentleman) "buy only things useless to humanity?" Not unless I had some designs upon the dear old man, and wished to see him safely landed in the poor-house shortly after. Possibly a more intimate acquaintance with the poor would have let a new kind of daylight into his soul; in short, he might have saved his soul, and that too not in an Orthodox sense.

Intelligent coöperation will, I believe, in a great measure check speculation. If there are any valuable elements in speculation, they will live to assert their own value. I am a firm believer in the survival of the fittest in all things. That some of the present conceptions of labor reform and coöperation have their grave errors, no intelligent man will deny.

Time and agitation will correct them. I repeat the question that closed my last article: "Who can lead the struggling poor to a point in knowledge they have not yet attained?"

Under such a teacher I will gladly take my place on the school-bench among the pupils. W. F. P.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

TO ADVERTISERS.

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of ditorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. CHARLES SUMNER'S GREAT WORK.

PROPHETIC VOICES

CONCERNING AMERICA.

By CHARLES SUMNER.

Aside from its literary and historical merits, this volume has a special interest, from the fact that it was the last work on which Mr. Sumner was engaged before his death.

"PROPHETIC VOICES" will be found of great value to all who take an interest in the history of our country, so full is it of passages in which the unexampled prosperity of our land has been foretold by philosophers, poets, statesmen, and orators, of whom the lamented author has also given interesting sketches.

Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

A NEW, SEARCHING, TIMELY BOOK, entitled

"THE GENESIS AND ETHICS OF CONJUGAL LOVE."

By Andrew Jackson Davis.

Treatment of all the delicate and important questions involved in Conjugal Love is straightforward, unmistakably emphatic, and perfectly explicit and plain in every vital particular. Mr. Davis has recently examined the whole field of Marriage, Parentage, Disaffection, and Divorce, and this little volume is the result; which now comes into the world because it is now both wanted and needed by all women and men.

* * * Our friend Andrew Jackson Davis has written a book this time that concerns everybody, and on this side of the great river. It certainly touches their bosoms if not their business, and people who do not care a pin what Mr. Davis thinks of the Summer Land will be interested to see what he knows about conjugal love, and the duties of the marriage relation. His book has a table of contents as attractive as a Delmonico bill of fare.—Golden Age.

Price, in paper covers, 50 cents; in handsome cloth, 75 cents; in full gilt and extra binding, $1. Postage free. The trade supplied on the most liberal terms. Published by the "Progressive Publishing House" of A. J. DAVIS & CO., No. 24 East Fourth Street, New York City

TO PUBLISHERS.

A PRINTER of Liberal views desires a situation on a weekly paper. Can set six thousand ems a day, work hand-press, make up forms, etc. Has done some job work, and can do what is necessary in a country printing-office. Has had some editorial experience, and considers himself competent to take charge of a country weekly. Is sober and industrious. Wages wanted, at least $12 per week. Address WILL KENNEDY,
Box 1037, ST PAUL, MINN.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX.

Bound volumes of THE INDEX for 1871, 1872, and 1873, will be sent by express (at the purchaser's expense) on receipt of $2.50, $2.50, and $3.00 respectively. These volumes are exceedingly valuable singly, irrespective of each other; for the important essays and other articles they contain are of permanent interest, and will furnish as instructive reading twenty years hence as to-day. No more valuable present could be made to a friend struggling out of Orthodoxy than one of these volumes.

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

We have already issued three editions, the last of which is nearly exhausted.

We desire soon to issue

Another Large Edition

of this and other tracts on the subject, so that we can place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

Last winter this subject was brought before the Legislature of the State, and many petitions were presented asking a repeal of these unjust laws.

The matter is still in their hands, and at the next session will undoubtedly be acted upon. Meanwhile the favoring justice and equity, should be distinctly heard.

Voice of the People,

We shall soon be ready to send out

thus giving an opportunity to those who have not already done so, to protest against this continued wrong.

Let us make it

ever presented to our legislative body.

Will those willing to assist in circulating these petitions please

SEND IN THEIR NAMES?

We would say, also that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

LIBERALS!

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished

REASONS FOR USING THE EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

YOUNG AMERICA is distanced by Young Christianity, for one is taxed while the other is exempt.

PRESIDENT GRANT'S letter to the Cincinnati Gazette is frank, honest, and very creditable to him.

THE QUESTION of tax-exemption is to come up in some practical shape in the next Assembly at Albany.

THE "King of the Cannibal Islands" will have to lunch without cold missionary. Fiji is annexed to London.

"DO ANGELS fly like birds?" That is what a couple of unfledged seraphs fought about in Detroit; but they didn't find out.

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION of New York City receive over $60,000 rent from the stores in their building; and it is untaxed.

THE AMOUNT of exempted private property in New York equals nearly one eighth of the entire assessed valuation of real estate in that city for the present year.

THE TOTAL AMOUNT of untaxed property in New York City, is about $150,000,000, one third of which is church property and another third belongs to various public institutions.

THE "Moral Education Association" will hold a meeting at No. 3 Tremont Place, on Friday, Nov. 6, at 3 P. M. Subject of discussion: "Purity." All interested are invited to attend.

CANADIAN PROTESTANTS are in favor of church taxation because the Catholics have so much more church property than themselves; which is a wretched reason for a just measure.

EMPEROR WILLIAM'S speech at the opening session of the Reichstag shows that Germany has achieved union without liberty. Both are indispensable; who can be satisfied with either alone?

"THE GOSPEL going up, and pork going down!" groaned a Chicago pork-packer lately, when they raised his pew-rent to $25. Not sagacious: there will be no pew-rent at all, when the gospel has "gone up."

THE "Paine Memorial Building and Home of the Boston Investigator" will probably be dedicated on January 29, Paine's birthday. It is to be a fine Hall, and we congratulate the builders on the success of their plan.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH lectured in Boston, on October 29, on Oliver Cromwell and George Washington; placing the latter far above the former because he reluctantly accepted, for his country's good, the power which the other seized eagerly for his own.

SUPERSTITION is as tenacious of life as truth. A Mrs. Melligan accidentally hung a young friend in New York, while measuring her with a clothes-line to tell her fortune! Such occurrences rather weaken the argument for Christianity which infers its truth from its longevity.

THE INCREASE of boldness with which the secular press deals with moss-grown dogmas is one of the most obvious signs of the times. The New York Sun, for instance, adds its mite to the vast pile of refutations under which you must hunt for the doctrine that rain comes in answer to prayer.

HARMONY between man and his surroundings is a great essential of happiness. When the free-thinker is obliged to dwell in a superstitious community (as who is not?), the consciousness of this religious inharmony is one of his chief burdens; and it would be almost unendurable to a sensitive spirit, were it not for the knowledge that he enjoys a higher harmony with universal truth than is possible to his condemners.

REV. DR. BEERS declared at the Episcopal Convention that "Professor Tyndall had, with verbal felicity which tingled in the ears like music, led many Christians to doubt whether the human race was an oyster-bed or a monkey-show; and we answer the argument by wrangling over a little matter like a ceremonial!" The Christians' doubt might be solved by inducing the monkey-show to eat the oyster-bed; in which case the human race would be both, and put an end to the controversy.

IN AN ADDRESS to the voters of Northampton just before the Parliamentary election, Mr. Bradlaugh is reported in the National Reformer to have made this confession: "Two ambitions he had had for long, and had still—one in life, to climb upwards, one to fight his way forward, one to win the foremost place in his country; and the other after life, that, when he was dead, and the green sward covered him, men and women might point out his grave to their children as the tomb of a man who served well the people who trusted him."

PROFESSOR TYNDALL'S Address has received a first-class advertisement. "Cardinal Cullen and the entire Catholic episcopate," says a despatch from Dublin of October 30, "have issued pastoral letters denouncing the late Address of Professor Tyndall at Belfast before the British Association, as a revival of paganism." To our surprise, we find ourself in favor of a "revival"! What a demented lot these old ladies must be not to know that, the more they butt against the Address, the worse they will "muss" their ecclesiastical bonnets! It is to be presumed their brains are useless except as battering-rams.

THE LONDON Saturday Review said, a year and a half ago: "American institutions admit of no protective mechanism except that of perfect political equality and universal suffrage." Add to this that political and civil rights necessitate each other, and that universal suffrage necessitates universal (or compulsory) education, and you have the whole political philosophy of the Great Republic in a nutshell. Amidst the perils and confusions of the hour, let the calm voice of the American Idea be heard and heeded. The only path of safety is that which leads to the absolute and unanimous recognition of these vital principles.

AS A REASON for believing that "lack of searching the Scriptures is our weakness," Rev. Mr. Bridgman, of Northampton, told the late convention of the Massachusetts Young Men's Christian Associations that "the daily papers of the age and the too numerously attractive magazines were crushing out the spiritual life of the people. They would be informed of the news day by day and month after month by the fresh periodical which engaged all their reading time. If they were not soon made subordinate to the study of the Scriptures, the cause would suffer." So Orthodoxy has declared war against literature, as Mrs. Partington did against the Atlantic Ocean. We tremble for literature!

PRESIDENT GRANT has officially appointed November 26 as a day of National Thanksgiving, and officially recommended "all citizens" to go to church and praise God on that day. We enter a serious protest against such official action, as a violation of official duty. "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion," says the Constitution; and in the matter of National Fasts President Jefferson had sufficient respect for the Constitution's spirit and intent to refuse to exercise a religious authority which it confers on no man. President Grant's action is a grave public offence. If gratitude to God is a duty of "all citizens," it is a private duty alone, incumbent only on those who recognize it as such; and it is a usurpation of theocratic functions for any President to interfere in any way with the private religious duties of the people. President Grant has given just offence to all citizens who conscientiously believe that Church and State ought to be kept totally separate.

Spiritual Force and its Supply.

A DISCOURSE IN LYRIC HALL, NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 20, 1874.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

The subject of this address is Spiritual Force and its Supply. There is a disposition in some quarters to undervalue what is called spiritual force, in comparison with material force, which many regard as being really the only force to be taken into account in the conduct of men. And though the phrase material force is vaguely used, and, when used otherwise than vaguely, is susceptible of high interpretations, still the meaning conveyed by it is that the powers represented by money, rank, position, brute force of intellect and will, machinery and the mind that wields it, are coming to supersede the more impalpable forces that religion claims to use, and that have always gone by the name of spiritual. It is this persuasion that I wish to combat, by contending for the validity of spiritual force as part of man's native endowment, and by pointing out the natural means of its increase. And, first, what are we to understand by spiritual force, as distinct from the ordinary action of intelligence as directed to the understanding of facts, or the conduct of ordinary business? Not superhuman nor supernatural force, let me say; not the force of spiritual beings outside of ourselves,—but a force inherent in ourselves, a potency of our own constitutions. Force of aspiration, reverence, hope, is spiritual force; faith in ideas, trust in principles, reliance on moral laws, is spiritual force; respect for justice, zeal for rectitude, love of truth, is spiritual force; sympathy with good people, interest in worthy concerns, devotion to unselfish ends, is spiritual force; moral enthusiasm for excellence is spiritual force. Accept what account you will of man's origin and cosmic destiny, be a disciple of Calvin or of Darwin, a pupil of Spurgeon or of Tyndall, a philosophical materialist or a philosophical spiritualist, under every and any theory, this account of spiritual force is good, and should be taken at its full value in estimating the powers that move and mould society. That this force should be overlooked, slighted, disregarded, allowed to lapse into imbecility, seems to me a very great misfortune. That it should be deliberately dethroned would be a disaster for which there is no compensation.

A distinguished preacher said lately, in an hour of confidence with his people, that of two things only he felt sure; all other points in his belief were more or less conjectural and incidental, but of two things he felt sure: first, the spiritual helplessness of man; second, the spiritual helpfulness of God. That man had no spiritual force available for his needs; that God had an inexhaustible supply which he was forever dispensing,—these were the cardinal points of this Evangelical preacher's creed. The two positions, it must be observed, stand together, each involving the other. They are, in fact, two sides of the same proposition, two parts of the same statement. The conspiracy between God and man is taken for granted; the helpfulness of the one steadily balancing the helplessness of the other. The difficulty is that while man is a fact, God is a supposition. The preacher was probably mistaken in thinking that his other beliefs were incidental, for, if he would make careful account of the contents of his mind, he would, probably, discover that certain theological dogmas—deity of Christ, incarnation, atonement—sustained his faith in the divine helpfulness. He would detect himself habitually thinking of God as an individual being, filling a local sphere, and holding direct personal relations with certain members of the human family who were called Christians. But now suppose this theological foundation, on which the belief in God's helpfulness rested, to be knocked away; suppose, that is, that the preacher's conception of God as an individual, local being, a Christ on a celestial throne, taking an interest in the personal affairs of his church, hearing and answering prayer, aiding private weakness and pardoning private sin, were disavowed, as it is by thousands today; what have we left but despair for the higher education and the nobler progress of mankind? What have we left but a confession that the animal forces of passion and self-seeking must henceforth have it all their own way in the formation of character and the development of social life?

The issue to be taken with the Evangelical preacher is on his first proposition—the spiritual helplessness of man. To me, at least, it occurs that, if history teaches anything with unquestionable clearness, it teaches the spiritual capability of man. Unless human nature, in all past ages, has made a strangely false confession, it has proved that its spiritual capacity is distinguished above every other. Its greatest achievements have only illustrated this. The record may prove, I believe it does, that such capacity has needed intelligence and discipline; but this very circumstance is convincing evidence that it was there. There must be wild horses before there can be useful ones.

Man's spiritual helplessness a thing to be taken for granted, as a primal fact in society! One might much more reasonably take for granted his material helplessness, his inability to make good his claim to health and wealth. The facts in the case lie, broad and massive, on the surface of the ground. They need but to be alluded to here.

1. It is worth noting, generally, and in the first place, how man, by virtue of some quality of his mind, has put interpretations upon material things, has associated them with thought and sentiment in a way to transfigure the outward universe, and make it, as it were, a symbol of invisible intelligence. The mountain was the emblem of majesty, the ocean of eternity, the river of bounty, the fountain of charity, the sunshine and the rain of broad and everlasting benignity, the dew of blessing. The sky was type of the all-covering heavens of love; the wind suggested the holier breath which was called spirit; in the chrysalis was caught a hint of immortality; in the three-leaved clover a living intimation of the mysterious trinity of elements that everywhere appeared. The fragile flowers preached a loveliness that never faded; the habits of birds, trees, reptiles, insects, told of other unchangeable habits that these only in their dumb way copied. This, of course, is nothing more than fancy, imagination, sentiment; but these are facts in the human constitution; mighty facts, allied to powers that have played a large part in the achievements of the race. They are the rudiments, we will say, of those spiritual forces before which men have trembled.

2. Do we seek a clearer sign of the validity of spiritual force? See what it has done in the form of architecture. The great buildings of the world, the costliest, the largest, the most majestic, the most beautiful, as creations of skill the most wonderful, as monuments of art the most splendid and enduring, are the temples of religion, the houses of the spirit. The Old World, as we call it, owes to them a large part of its present interest and fame. England, France, Germany, Italy, Greece, Egypt, India, China, the lands where the greatest races have flourished, the lands where the great races had their origin, bear on their bosom, either as miracles of grandeur and marvels of loveliness, or as stupendous mysteries of ruin, these triumphs of creative genius. In erecting them, millions gave their labor, generations gave their time, kings gave their treasure, master-minds gave their thought; the earth gave the gleam of its marble, the strength of its iron, the glory of its silver and gold, the lustre of its gems; and all was done under the working of the invisible hands of faith and love. Admit that ignoblest motives played their part, admit that the basest passions, the most abject fears, the most sordid interests, had their share in the work, still the activity of these must be accounted for; and their presence, yet more their submission, attests the controlling influence of the sentiments of aspiration and worship, the feeling of the reality of divine things which is so significant an element in the human constitution. The king's palaces sink into insignificance by the side of these amazing structures; cities have disappeared, and left them standing; civilizations have perished, and they remain; tribes of men have passed away from the scene of their conquest and pride, and bequeathed only these ruins to tell where and what they were. The monuments of their adoration alone bear witness to their past existence. How can one, remembering the rock temples of Hindostan, the gigantic remains of Thebes, the mournful beauty of the Parthenon at Athens, or the loveliness of the Temple of Neptune on the solitary promontory of Pæstum, speak of the spiritual imbecility of man? For in these structures faith has indeed proved itself equal to the task of taking up mountains in its invisible hands. In the presence of these things the thought of man's spiritual potency is uppermost and supreme.

3. Turn to literature. The literature of the race is thus far its greatest achievement. And of all literatures existing among men, the spiritual literatures are the grandest,—the richest books, those that attest the highest intellectual power, the strongest thought, the clearest perception, the deepest insight, the firmest judgment, the widest observation, the warmest enthusiasm, the most far-reaching anticipation, the most indomitable faith in man and his destiny, are the bibles. They are monumental, eternal books; by every nation treasured as its most precious inheritance. The scientific mind has produced great works, the philosophical mind has filled libraries with its speculative thought. But, in both quantity and quality of productiveness, the spiritual mind outdoes them all. What beliefs have ever ruled the world as spiritual beliefs have? What beliefs have ever been so condensed and compacted as to become "creeds" professed by nations and subduing races? What ideas have ever so made themselves the animating spirit of epochs? Theology, that intellectual and literary fact which so many cling to, and so many assail, revere it or despise it, honor it or hate it, as we will, is a fact of the spiritual order, and stands as a permanent witness of the action of powers that are neither to be discredited nor condemned.

4. But there is another test that to some will be more convincing than any of the foregoing, to which allusion at least must be made. I mean the test of character. Character is disciplined will, said the German Novalis. Might it not be better said that character is condensed aspiration, compacted and organized fidelity? Character is the greatest human achievement, greater than creeds, theologies, bibles, cathedrals. On a friend's estate, by the sea-side, all alone in a rocky cleft, a ruin of jagged rocks all about it, no earth visible within yards, exposed to the fiercest winter blasts from the ocean, to the fiercest summer heats, to snow, and tempest, and bitter spray, I saw an old cedar-tree. It had stood there probably four or five hundred years. It is a strange object to see, gnarled and twisted, without bark, its wood hard as iron, its fibres bound round and round its trunk like masses of cord, its boughs huddled together as if for mutual protection, griping each other closely, interlaced so compactly as to form a network hardly pervious to the swift wind or the driving rain, every atom of vitality in it brought into use for safety against the elements, and its broad crest flat and thick, green as emerald, and in appearance soft as young grass, yet so solid that a man might sit upon it as upon firm ground. It was an emblem of vitality resisting the pressure of outward circumstances. It was the result of the conflict between the compacted force of aërial currents, the fine tricklings of sap, and the wild, destructive powers of the surrounding nature. The tree was an emblem of rugged manhood. As we look over the records of history, we see human beings who in certain aspects resemble that ancient cedar. The spiritual vitality in them, their faith, their love, their reverence, self-respect, adoration of qualities that seemed noble, have triumphed over the wild elements about them, and made them invulnerable to outward assault. These are the people of character. They are found everywhere, in Christendom and out of it, before Christ and since, in all ranks and conditions of life, among the uncultured and the cultured, the taught and the untaught. They are known by their clearness of moral conception, their constancy under trial, their fortitude in suffering, their patience, kindness, integrity, disinterestedness, charity. The number of these is very great, much greater than is believed. The Church speaks of the "glorious company of the apostles," the "noble army of martyrs." The people I allude to cannot be fairly called by such fine names, but they do display some qualities equally honorable. They are a glorious company. They are a noble army. Be their number fewer or larger, they equal that of any other strongly-characterized class. The discoverers and inventors, the men eminent for scientific ability, industrial enterprise, skill in affairs, the men illustrious in art, music, statesmanship, literature, are less numerous than these. The fine saints outnumber the fine sages. Character is a larger fact than genius, probably, all things taken into account; goodness is a more general phenomenon than greatness. Neither is frequent perhaps. High character is rare. But though much rarer, its existence would establish the validity of the force that rears it. And regarding goodness as an indication of spiritual as contrasted with merely intellectual power, or force of will, we may fairly appeal to its manifestation as evidence of the spiritual force I insist on.

But now it will be urged, or would be urged by the Evangelical preacher whom I quoted in the beginning, that all this is due, not to any power inherent in man himself, but to the abounding helpfulness of God, who will never leave man to himself. You do but make more evident the divine graciousness, the preacher would say, when you dilate on these spiritual achievements. But for that perpetual assistance they would all disappear. Nay, already, are they not disappearing, as men doubt the divine sufficiency and decline to seek it? These triumphs you describe are in the past, where the faith in God was, where belief in Saviors and Christs was; and the declining reliance on these, cutting off the heavenly supply as it does, is accompanied straightway by a moral and spiritual faintness which is visible in character, architecture, literature, cast of opinions, tone of sentiment, texture of purpose, all going to show that man is spiritually helpless, and will demonstrate his imbecility more and more as he loses his hold on the Christ of God. The preacher points to the low state of conviction and character in the modern social and political world, and explains it on the ground of man's powerlessness to help himself. To recover from it it will, in his judgment, be necessary to discard his disbelief, repel his doubts, repudiate his science and philosophy, falsely so called, and return to the faith of the great ages. Let him do this, and once more, we are promised, the spiritual force in man will show signs of quickening and revival; the old manifestations will be repeated; the old triumphs will be renewed.

This is a question that cannot be argued here. I must content myself now with saying that the preacher's assertion rests on no solid basis of evidence. It is mere assumption that the spiritual force of man is not as inherent in him and as native to him, as much his own as any other of his forces. The facts of its growth in one age and its decline in another may be explained, possibly, without recourse to the Evangelical theology which men are discarding. I might question whether the historical connection between the action of the spiritual force and the fidelity of theological belief can be established. I might challenge the assertion that the spiritual force is on the decline along with theological faith. But, for the present, let this pass. I am interested now in presenting another account of it which the divine has omitted to notice. This, namely, that on the social spirit, rather than the theological, the spiritual force depends for its fulness. It is with the increase or the decrease of the social feeling that the spiritual force waxes and wanes. The periods when it has been at its height have been periods when social feeling and organization were strong. The periods when it has been weak have been periods when social feeling has been sluggish, social organization feeble, social sympathy dull; when men have lived in, by, and for themselves, and the sense of communion of life has been supplanted by a sense of individual sufficiency and pride. That this is the real secret of the ebb and flow of spiritual power can, I believe, be established by the study of it in the past. That it may well be the secret will be apparent to any who will consider the most obvious effects of human sympathy; for whoever will consider these as they are presented to him, or may be presented to him almost daily, will be led to confess that sincere relations with humanity in the form of human creatures, singly or in groups of greater or smaller dimensions, bring with them every degree of stimulus to the higher moral and spiritual force. If a being like Jesus could drink inspiration from mental association with the great souls of his nation's glorious past, from Moses and Elias, with whom he held communion in thoughtful hours; if a person like Paul could be taken beyond himself in the enthusiasm of a high purpose and the passionate rapture of a perfect consecration through the habitual communication by thought and desire with the Jesus whom he never saw, except in vision and imagination—surely, men and women whose felt needs are less imperious, and whose conscious desires are less greedy, may catch inspiration from the human creatures whose greatness or whose want touches them immediately.

They who are powerless and hopeless alone are strong and sanguine in company with others who make demands on them, either from above or from beneath. Of ourselves we can, indeed, do nothing. Our sufficiency is of humanity. But that is imparted wherever humanity is vitally touched.

One starts forth alone on a long walk, in nimble spirits, with springy foot. For a space the air, the scene, the motion, are exhilarating; but before long the way becomes wearisome; he feels the heat; the dusty road is hard to travel; the scene ceases to interest; his thoughts drag; he would fain sit down by the wayside and rest. A companion comes by; he takes the road again with increased courage; the weakness and fatigue disappear; the landscape puts on fresh attractions; the scene is reinvested with interest. He forgets that he is footsore; he no longer measures the miles. The wayside chat and sympathy make a tiresome tramp pleasant. So simple a sharing of the journey will reinforce vigor and make one twice the man he had been.

Let the companion be one greatly superior to himself, whose lively talk fills his mind with entertainment, the effect is indefinitely increased. Let the companion be one greatly inferior to himself—a little child, for instance, who depends on him for guidance, support, protection, whom he must bring safely to his mother—the exultation of energy is strangely increased. The power of thoughtful consideration, of carefulness, of tender solicitude, of gentle attention, of sweet, loving speech and deed rises to a degree that could scarcely be believed. The selfish man forgets himself, the timid man is bold, the tired man is buoyant, the crabbed man is gracious. The little child is the medium through which human need appeals to him, human responsibility lays its claim upon him, human helplessness touches him. In leading and comforting the child, thoughts of the father and mother come to his aid. Goethe said there are three worships—worship of that which is above us; worship of that which is on a level with us; and worship of that which is below us; and the last is the highest of the three. In a case like that I have supposed—in the case of a mother with her sick or unfortunate child, of a good man with a broken, disconsolate fellow,—the truth of the illustrious German's saying is seen. Giving or receiving, it is the sincere contact with human kind that raises spiritual power to its highest level.

Two years ago a young man, often seen in our Sunday assembly, deliberately gave his life rather than forsake a lad who had been committed to him. It was by the sea-side. A mother had entrusted her only boy to him, in the water, for he was a strong swimmer. Insensibly the undertow carried them away beyond the line of safety; the two became separated. The lad slipped from his companion's arm beyond power of recovery. The stout swimmer could easily have saved himself by striking for the shore. On the sands watching him were his young wife and his lovely children, towards whom his whole heart yearned. But on the sands was also the mother of the lad he had taken with him and lost. He had never passed for a hero. An elegant, graceful, accomplished fellow, generous and courteous, with dashes of chivalry in him,—all this he was known to be: but few, if any, suspected the grandeur of soul there was also. But in that supreme moment he rose to the point of saintliness. As, in an instant, the situation broke upon him, the angel of sacrifice ed him beyond him rything faded into shadow before the law of obligation to which he felt he had not been true. What would existence be after such a failure? To face the bereaved mother would have been as easy as to face the mother of his own children, into whose pure eyes he could not have gazed without self-reproach. So, with a look of agony he went down—overwhelmed, not by the ocean, but by the sense of obligation to the unseen humanity, in the embrace of which alone he was able to live.

In the longer and more perilous journey of life, let any one consider the need and the power of human sympathy. It floods the heart as the sea floods the creek when the dam at its mouth is broken down. Powerless is any one, even the strongest, to face life's ills or stand up under life's calamities alone. Poverty, sorrow, desertion, temptation, will bewilder the clearest private judgment and prostrate the firmest individual will. The greatest that have lived have been forced to brace themselves against the support of their fellow-men, the present or the remembered, and draw from communion with them new supplies of power. If they fly to the arms of an infinite being the infinite being bears to them the form of a man. If they fly to the Mother of God, the Mother of God stands before their eyes painted on canvas or carved in wood, in the likeness of a sweet woman with a child in her arms, and such a look of compassion on her face as human countenances wear in their moments of deepest pity. In trial, trouble, danger, the effort always is to get close to some warm heart that can communicate vitality to the fainting mind. By prayer, confession, contrition, humiliation, acts of piety toward heaven, men have merely tried to put themselves in immediate concourse with human qualities raised to an infinite power. To the Romanist the priest represents the pure, unadulterated, unprejudiced human nature freed from the limitations of class or condition. The confessional stands for conscience immaculate and unswerving. Absolution is the sinner's acquittal by the verdict of his kind. The pious churchman finds comfort and strength in his church as being a vast company of believers with whom he, through faith and love, shares a common life. He may be a very obscure person, of no consideration in the world, with no acquaintance in the great multitude of his fellow-worshippers; but he is sensible of their fellowship, though they be princes and princesses, gentles and ladies of lofty degrees; in their felicity he feels himself to be a partaker. When I have seen in a European cathedral or Romanist church in New York, some poor, lonely, aged, widowed woman kneeling, unconscious of the crowds about her, with an expression of perfect patience and trust on her wrinkled face as she told her petitions on her beads, and have thought of the tides of power that set through the frail form, I have wondered afresh at the virtue there is in human fellowship, even while it is unspoken; for this poor woman understood nothing that was said. Her knowledge of theology was the smallest. Of ideas her mind was wholly innocent. Long before she got to the mysteries her intelligence would be lost. The power that helped her was the power of association. The painted virgin was to her a real person who heard her prayer; the carved Christ was a sympathizing man; the priest was a brother, and even the figures on the stained windows were floating ministers of mercy.

Jesus said, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." And so it was. The glowing, adoring thought of the friend they had known and honored brought to them the inspiration of his character, and poured a fresh tide of enthusiasm into their fainting hearts. There was no mystery about it. The explanation is quite simple, as simple as the filling of a basin when connection is established with the river. Two or three have more humanity than one. Collective life is more abounding than individual life. And when the collective life is rich and various, as it easily may be made by thought, if not by personal communication, the enhancement and exaltation of power cannot be measured. The mental and moral expansion is immense.

We saw how this was in the period of moral struggle that preceded our civil war. In the course of that struggle examples were frequent of the exhibition, on the part of ordinary people, of the highest qualities of patience, fortitude, devotion, self-forgetfulness, truth. Slow-tongued people astonished us by their eloquence; wilful people amazed us by their submission; ambitious people surprised us by their consecration.

The civil war illustrated this on a stupendous scale. Half the courage, the chivalry, the heroic self-surrender of those years has never been recorded, and will never be divulged. And these qualities were shown by men and women from whom nothing of the kind could have been expected, many of them people of luxury and fashion, easy, agreeable people, whose life was one of innocent gayety—many of them people of loose and idle life, hangers-on of large cities, the parasites of civilization—many of them adventurers on the look-out for excitement and ready for the first that offered. Yet among these were many who rose to the highest level of human qualities, bore weariness, endured hunger and thirst, braved danger, faced death, met wounds and sickness, with a spirit they could not understand themselves. It was the contagion of a great fellowship that bore them up. Each drew on the general fund. As the bundle of fagots makes a fascine that will resist a cannon-ball, so the multitude of human infirmities made a bulk of power in which all sense of individual infirmity was lost. The war over, the stress relaxed, the bond of faith loosed, the separate individuals went back to their places, sunk into their former selves once more, and in the majority of cases were the same people of ordinary calibre they had always been esteemed.

Great forces need great supplies; and when the great supplies are wanting, as for the most part they are, great forces cannot be looked for. All unusual efforts have been due to an unusual stir and interfusion of minds. The great things are done by the concurrence of many wills, a concurrence often so unexpected and unaccountable as to seem supernatural. They are possible only in an age when people live in others than themselves, consult general interests, take the well-being of many into account, and set their personal duty in the light of a comprehensive weal. No religious beliefs will afford the smallest aid when the sense of human allegiance is low. When the sense of allegiance is clear and strong, the moral tide rises, though no religious beliefs, technically so called, be professed; as is shown to-day in the case of earnest Positivists, who, though discarding all recognition of a personal God, a superhuman Providence, or a conscious immortality after death, display, nevertheless, qualities worthy of the devoutest ages of faith.

An age of individualism wherein each lives for himself alone, consults solely his private interest, considers first and last what will make for his own personal or social aggrandizement, looks about him enough for his own safety and no more, seeks no truth beyond his present opinion, welcomes no duty that interferes with his momentary mood, adopts no standard of action above a regard for his selfish profit,—an age of perpetual self-reference cannot, from the nature of the case, be an age of high moral or spiritual qualities. You might as well require each separate particle of iron to be a bar, each distinct link of steel to be a chain. There is not likely to be a revival of moral and spiritual force until the age of individualism gives way to an age of fellowship—not the sentimental fellowship of religion, as commonly interpreted; not the symbolic fellowship of the church, which has no real substance; not the political or partisan fellowship, that creates trade unions, workingmen's conspiracies, cabals for place or power,—but an honest, considerate fellowship of human beings as such with other human beings as such; a fellowship based on the perfectly well-established relations which hold between each and all and all and each; a fellowship fortified by a faithful consideration of the bearing of the individual conduct on the general welfare. Such a fellowship clearly is practicable; such a fellowship the early apostles of the Christian faith endeavored to establish within the rather narrow limits of their communion; such a fellowship the Christian Church might have established on a grand scale if it had confined its regards to the family of man on this planet instead of allowing its thought to be dissipated in visions of post-mortem felicity; such a fellowship is contemplated by the wisest and most earnest workers of to-day, who have in view nothing more than a sincere and honest alliance between man and man.

The problem to be solved is the communication to the solitary, isolated individual of the combined virtue that is vested in the many who constitute his larger or smaller world. Of course, all cannot solve the problem by the same methods. Some will, through the imagination, make the desired connection; some through feeling, some through conscience, some through thought, some through friendship or practical service. Each must make it in the most feasible way. The one thing of moment is to make it.

As one of those who share the ancient traditions of respect for honor, truth, generosity, disinterestedness, magnanimity, virtues of the grand order, I look for the time when the conditions of their supply will be given again by a frank acknowledgement of the truth that men are, not sentimentally or figuratively, but actually and heartily, members one of another.

THE F. R. A. CONVENTION AT PROVIDENCE.

BY S. H. MORSE.

The sessions of the Free Religious Association held at Howard Hall, Providence, October 28th and 29th, offered the people of that vicinity the opportunity of hearing some of the many sides of Free Religion ably discussed. The occasion was appreciated. Providence has lately waked up, and the audiences she assembles to consider religious questions from a radical point of view are large and intelligent. Boston seldom shows so fine an assembly as gathered at this Free Religious summons.

The first evening Mr. Frothingham introduced the business of the Convention with an elaborate and interesting statement of the objects of the Association. Of this address only a few of the leading points can be given. He said:—

"The Free Religious Association presents itself for the first time to the citizens of Providence, and thanks them for the large welcome which it receives. Our conventions are unlike most religious conventions. We have no great array of lordly names, no long roll of churches, no certificates of membership, no formularies in regard to the ritualism to be discussed. We simply present ourselves as a body of men who have an idea which they believe deeply concerns the American people. That we are worthy representatives of the idea we have never claimed. We are simply representatives of the idea which the time has called up. We shall be very happy on our part when younger men will come forward and take our places, and give to our idea a larger interpretation than it has ever been able to receive from us. . . .

"If we deal with theology at all, it is that we may do away entirely with the theological method and substitute the scientific method in its place. You understand the difference between the two methods. Science studies facts; theology studies creeds. Science says the newest truth is the truest; theology says the oldest truth is the truest. Science looks forward; theology looks backward. Science looks with its open eyes at the creation as it is; theology speculates with closed eyes on the creation as it has been supposed to be. The method of science may lead to Trinity, to Atonement; who knows? Stick to the method is all we insist upon. The method of theology may, by-and-by, lead to Materialism; who knows? The method is wrong whatever it leads to.

"But we are not engaged, friends, in any theological war. The question that presses sorely upon us is that religion will not confine itself to speculation, but that it insists upon striving for personal power. The churches are struggling for power—not for truth, not for humanity, not for philanthropy, but for individual power, each religion standing upon its own platform, gathering about it its own methods, and using every means—not always amiable, not always just means—to further its own ends and establish its own dominion. . . . Is not the English Church striving for power in England—striving against the Catholic Church on the one side and against Rationalism on the other? What means that debate that has been going on for the last week in New York in the Episcopal Church about Ritualism? What do they care about Ritualism except as Ritualism means Romanism? and the struggle there is, which—Protestant Episcopacy or Catholicism—shall have the revenues, and the estate, and the prestige, and the social influence that the Episcopal Church holds to-day. It is the Episcopal Church in America against the Catholic Church in America—the Episcopal Church being divided against itself. And how the battle goes on in London and all over England against Romanism on the one side, and Infidelity, so-called, on the other, and dissent on the other, is known to all readers of the papers. . . .

"It deeply concerns the American people to see to it that this struggle for power between the churches is not carried on upon the field of education. The people are gradually learning that a uniform system of education is required. What stands in the way? This battle of the churches.

"Again, what is the significance of the taxation of church property? Simply this, whether or not the churches shall preserve their power. Tax the Roman Catholic churches in New York! Tax the Episcopal churches in New York! Why, you would forever make it impossible for them to build costly churches. The very spread of the doctrine would be arrested. And the poor people who earn sweaty money by the sweat of their brows, the hundreds of thousands of artisans, and mechanics, and laborers who pay this money for the support of these theological dogmas would simply have more comfortable homes, better roofs over their heads, better and more plentiful food to eat, better schools for their children, and a better chance for the future for themselves. We say the Americans cannot afford to do it. They are not rich enough to do it. They never will be rich enough to do it. . . .

"We would arrest this struggle of the churches, one against the other, for preëminence and power. We plead for economy. The American people need money. The Americans need all the money they can command. With all their industry, with all their enterprise, with all their fortitude, with all their saving, with all their thrift, they will hardly get money enough to carry on the necessary business of the country. We say, therefore, 'You cannot afford to spend millions a year for churches, millions a year for Bibles, millions a year for tracts, millions a year to convert the heathen in Timbuctoo. You cannot afford it. You need all your money for your own purposes. Religion is cheap. Pure religion is cheap. It costs very little for people to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences. It costs very little to erect suitable houses in which to meet and praise God and celebrate his goodness. You can have all the appliances you need, and pay honestly for them, and be none the poorer. But you cannot give Romanism all that it wants, and Protestantism all that it wants, and yet have enough for yourselves.' It is said that if you touch the pockets of the American people you touch their tender point. It is true, and it ought to be true. People ought to value their money, for money is a tremendous power. Does not Romanism know it? Indeed it does, and consequently it does not wish its temples to be taxed. Do not Protestants know it? Indeed they do, and therefore they are unwilling that their churches should be taxed.

"We plead, therefore, for economy. We say, 'Take heed that you don't spend your money for that which is not bread, and your labor for that which satisfieth not.'

"Again, we plead for peace. We are tired of this endless battle of religions—the incessant wars of the churches. They have wearied out the patience of the world for ages—a battle of theology, and now a battle of ecclesiasticism—families divided, churches split asunder, and the dream of brotherhood postponed indefinitely (may it not be endlessly?), by the very power that means brotherhood, the very power which means one thing if it means anything—union, harmony, sympathy, coöperation, combination between the finite and the infinite, between men as brothers, between man and the infinite Father above. . . .

"Just as long as religion means despotism—call the religion by beautiful names; if you will, call it Mohammedanism, call it Buddhism, call it Christianity—it matters not so long as religion means despotism. Then the more beautiful it is, the more gracious and graceful it is, the more dangerous it is.

"Therefore we take our stand simply in behalf of humanity, in behalf of human harmony and peace and sympathy. We take our stand against all these efforts on the part of any church to lift up its head above its neighbors. . . .

"When bishops and priests of any name whatever will bend the knee to humanity, our warfare is ended."

At the conclusion of Mr. Frothingham's address, Mr. Potter, as Secretary, explained more in detail the nature of the Association, reading the article of the Constitution which embodies its principles.

Mr. Gannett followed Mr. Potter, concluding his remarks as follows: "Thanks for an association whose definition of religion is so broad that it transcends all the sect barriers and underlies all the sect cornerstones. Thanks for that association which says to all men, 'You are of us religiously, for wider fellowship, then for clearer outlooks into the truth of the universe in this day of shifting thought, and for opposition to all those churches which beset us where ecclesiasticism is gaining ground.' For these objects there is need of association, and therefore we are not only religious—not only free religious—but a Free Religious Association."

On Thursday morning, Mr. Potter read a paper on "The Spirit of Sectarianism." He defined the spirit of sectarianism to be that spirit which assumes that a particular church or religious denomination has all of religious truth that is necessary for human beings to possess, or gives the one correct interpretation of religious truth. Though the religions of the world may be considered as sects, yet they began and obtained their growth and power through a new emphasis and vitality, not of that which is dividing and partial, but of that which is universal and uniting.

"The high tide of spiritual enthusiasm and elevated moral life in which religions begin after a time naturally subsides, and then it is that the spirit of sectarianism sets in. The tide having become a historical fact, the descendants of the people whom it has floated to new shores, and enriched with new possessions, fall to debating as to how the tide came, and whence it originated, and what was the form and direction of its waves, and where was the point of highest flood. Thus it is that the spirit of sectarianism begins and progresses in the midst of a religion. It is an attempt of the human mind to restore the conditions of vitalized sentiment in which religions originate, or at least to keep up a logical connection with them by the institution of exercises in spiritual mechanics, that it is thought will some day become vital. Sects form according as the problem of the means to be used to this end is sought to be settled in one way or another.

"Coleridge said: 'He that loves Christianity better than truth will soon love his own sect or party better than Christianity, and will end by loving himself better than all.' This indicates the central evil of sectarianism from which all other evils flow. The evil is that some special system or idea is made the end instead of truth itself. The sects dispute as to some doctrine or form of ecclesiastical equality, but they all agree that the doctrine or form is designed to establish and maintain connection with the past epoch of spiritual life, that from its reservoirs the spiritual wants of the day may be supplied. The great question of the Christian sects is how they shall continue to reach that spiritual spring and convey its abundant waters to thirsty lips to-day; and over that question they debate with bitter temper, striving to thwart each other's projects, and each to turn the other's hurt to his own advantage."

Mr. Potter discussed the subject at some length, drawing illustrations from the history of Christianity. He closed with these words: "Be it ours to help society forward to this blessed consummation—to the day when the highest creed shall be faith not merely in truth discovered, but in the pursuit of truth, and the highest object of a church shall be to promote the love of truth as the highest possible adoration of God, and the practice of truth as the best possible service to man."

Rowland Connor was the next speaker. He said: "To the extent that sectarianism arises from the exercise of reason, it can not be done away with. And sects must antagonize, must hold each to its own convictions, and oppose the convictions of others. But each should remember that, however sacred the truth it held, there was always something beyond. Your creed must be regarded as temporary. As fast as people growing get the benefit of the old creed, a new one is demanded. The evil lies in holding fast to the old form, when all its life and saving power have vanished. The old spirit would crush every thing that would show the creed to be false; the new spirit would welcome every such agent, and say, 'Show me my errors,' and rejoice in the escape."

Mr. Abbot said that the word sect was often vaguely used. It meant, in its derivation, a slice, or a piece cut off. The sects were sliced or cut off from something. Go back to the Reformation. The new sects were fragments broken off from the Roman Catholic Church. It is by this breaking-off process that all the sects are formed. Christianity itself was a sect. All the great religions were sects—all parts of the human race. All sects must return into the greater unity from which they sprung—humanity. It was in the name of this common humanity that he would war upon the sects. Opposition to sects does not destroy communion with those who compose them.

Mr. Abbot said: "I think we shall command ten times the response from the public that we now have, and find our power quadrupled, when we stand as the avowed and confessed representatives of the spirit that is going to destroy and reconstruct civilization—destroy it temporarily in its outward form and wrappings, merely for the sake of building it anew with a nobler spirit, into a finer and larger result. That is the simple truth."

Mrs. E. D. Cheney was then invited to address the audience. She said: "The one thing that is necessary to destroy the evils of sectarianism is the spirit of mutual respect, a recognition of the fact that each is not the whole, but is simply related to the whole. The church can go on while the sects still exist, each an organic conserver of its own truth, which it holds most dear. The church can become a unit if we only recognize the spirit of self-respect and mutual relation, which should bind all together."

The last speaker was the Rev. Mr. Elder, of Lexington. He said that every sect that has ever exerted any influence in the world represents a deep-seated principle. It stands for a truth which we are not to lose sight of, because of the narrowness of the zeal which may be manifested in connection with it. Every man's faith, however broad it may be, is in a measure an individualistic faith. Out of that inevitable difference, which is right and proper, there arises a sect, there arises a tendency to emphasize that difference. It is only by this necessitated emphasis of each particular truth that the whole truth, in all its breadth and immensity, is uttered. There is not a sect too many among all the innumerable sects of Protestantism. Each one emphasizes that which is to itself of the most importance, and by that special emphasis the whole truth in a manner comes to be uttered.

In the afternoon, Dr. C. A. Bartol was introduced by the President, and commanded the undivided attention of the audience for more than an hour, while he read an essay upon, "A False Theology Demoralizing to Conscience." He commenced by saying that the duty which he felt to be imposed upon him at the present time was disagreeable, yet regarding it a duty which he would not shrink from, drawing the proper lesson from the most astounding scandal that this continent ever saw. Probably no subject ever filled so many columns in the newspapers, became so generally a subject of conversation among both young and old, and in regard to which opinion was so sharply divided. Indeed, had a volcano broken out in the midst of the land, it would not more fully have commanded the general attention.

"The inquiry comes home to us: What means the eruption of this moral Etna or Vesuvius? With so much smoke of scandal there must be some fire of offence. The lawyers say that all the facts in the case can be explained on the supposition of guilt, and but few or none of them satisfactorily upon the opposite supposition. Upon the original offence follow mendacity, perjury, bribery, and libel. An honest judgement in regard to the matter is not to be looked for in the newspapers, since editors write their leaders with a view to the prejudices of the subscription list or the stockholders' list, and several of them have avowed that they hold one opinion in private, but utter another to the public in the editorial column. Nor," said the preacher, "do I forget that the pulpit is just as partial and uncandid. The lesson comes to us in the relation of cause and effect. There is always a connection, a concatenation of events. Making what allowance may be claimed to the peculiarities, the characteristics, or the temptations of the individual, there is a remoter but not less real cause in the theological training of the individual referred to, and those who sustain him in the course of procedure taken.

"The doctrine that ours is a fallen race, that man is inherently depraved and necessarily sinful; that pardon can come only through atoning blood, and that righteousness is but filthy rags, leads to the demoralization both of public and private conscience. It seems to follow logically that if goodness is held to be not worthy, then vice is to be held not unworthy. Orthodoxy may account it a slander to say that it does not preach virtue and sanctity. Incidentally and inconsistently it does so preach, but the emphasis is always upon the articles of faith." Francis Wayland, in conversation with the speaker, admitted that the ministers of his denomination, the Baptist, preached morals too little and doctrines too much. The speaker proceeded to say that the lamentable and chiefly reprehensible thing is not the conduct of the individual, though no cloak was ever made broad enough to cover that, but the proceedings of the church and council, the Sanhedrim of the denomination. The council had the case before it, but it shied from the moral question involved to consider the technical and trivial one as to whether a member was properly dropped from the roll of church membership. The main charge it declined wholly to probe or touch with the pointing of its finger.

The Committee of Investigation appointed by the Plymouth Church were declared by the speaker to be open to the same condemnation of a willingness to hide or evade the moral offence; and he compared their conduct with that of a publishing house in Germany, which had refused to go forward and issue the translation of the Life of Christ, from considerations of moral principle. A distinguished man of the city of Boston had said that Beecher preached sentiment rather than morals, and this opinion the speaker thought well founded, and quoted in support of it a passage from an address by Beecher to some theological students. The purpose of the address was to advise the students how to preach successfully, and the words were: "If you do not feel your subject you must act as if you felt it, and so carry your congregation." The duplicity thus advised the speaker held to be proof of a lack of moral stamina on the part of the adviser. The absence of frankness on the part of Beecher in regard to the charges against him, and his anxiety to keep all facts hidden as long as possible, were commented upon, and it was remarked that he who is sincere and pure will never need to sign a tripartite treaty. True charity does not call on us to screen the offender, but we are to be charitable rather in the interest of virtue, of purity in the family, and of the welfare of mankind.

Col. Higginson was then introduced by the President. He said that he was a member of the Free

Religious Association, and it seemed to be his duty, as an officer of the Association, to say that this Association, or this platform, are not to be held responsible for the terrific personal discussion we have heard, for the subject which was chosen, the treatment adopted, or the verdict rendered. Evidence there was none. "I concede," he said, "that my venerable friend has a right to stand here and utter his thoughts on any subject, however improper they may seem to me; but I trust that the Free Religious Association is not so much more cruel than any other ecclesiastical association, that it undertakes to discipline those not of its own communion. I trust it is not so much more merciless than a legal tribunal that it presumes a man guilty until he has proved his innocence. We see under this vast cloud of scandal, which has spread across the land, the struggling forms of men and women. We see the struggle but dimly. All we know, officially or individually, is that somewhere, under that cloud, there are guilty men and women, and that there are innocent men and women. We don't know who they are; and what are we, that we should be so much sterner than the law, and so much more impatient than God's Providence? Why should we pronounce the verdict, and dismiss into ignominy the most earnest advocate of free thought in America? This is a time of great ecclesiastical confusion, we say. We read the reports of the various church conventions, however, and we find that this good thing is coming out of all the chaos: more of the work that brings people together, and less talk about theology. Behind the Episcopal Church, in all its range, we see the need of men to work together, in and out of the church. There is a tendency among the churches to get nearer to one another, and all around the cup of good-will is passed. I believe that it is not the time of intensifying ecclesiastical controversies, but of increasing good-will, born, not of logic, but of love, among the different bodies. Men are coming to care more for character than for doctrine, and it is no matter what creed a man may profess to believe, you can't bind him with it. I believe, therefore, that it is important, in this age, that Free Religious men and women should be, as they always have been, at least on the score of character, the leaders of their time. We have grand doctrines that teach us to believe in human character. If there are any persons on earth who should go amongst the most degraded of God's creatures, with strength, with hope, and with faith, it is those who believe in Free Religion; for we do not believe man to be hopelessly fallen. We believe that in the worst is the seed of virtue, and in the best the seed of sin. We do not call anything common or unclean, be it a sinner who has never known the shape of virtue, or be it some fallen clergyman who has found virtue only to forsake it."

At the conclusion of Col. Higginson's remarks, the President stated that it was generally understood that no one speaking on the Free Religious platform spoke otherwise than for himself.

Mr. Potter made the further statement that Colonel Higginson, in the excitement of the occasion, had overstepped the line of his privilege. The Association had invited Dr. Bartol to speak, and it expected him to express his own views upon the subject he had chosen, and to stand for them. The Association did neither indorse nor repudiate them, and neither Colonel Higginson nor any other member of the Association could undertake, in behalf of the Association, to indorse or repudiate them. He might speak for himself, but not as one having authority. This announcement was received with hearty and long continued applause, and the rebuke was generally felt to be well merited.

Mrs. Cheney then addressed the Convention, urging the importance of truth and the search after it.

The President then, as customary near the close of each session, invited any one in the audience who might have a word to say by way of criticism or suggestion to speak. Mr. L. K. Joslin, of Providence, responded briefly, saying that he thought Free Religion should cover the whole ground of our present life. Freedom should be wholly applied as the method of progress. If free was a good and true word to prefix to the word religion, then surely it was a good and true word to prefix to the even more sacred word love.

The closing session in the evening was largely attended. Mr. Weiss read his essay on "Tyndall's Address and his Critics." He said that the subject of Tyndall's address included a sketch of the development of human thought in its efforts to explain phenomena, from its first rude impulse to its latest expression in the theories of Darwin and Spencer. It was the opinion of the speaker that nowhere else could we find so clear and thorough a statement of the theories of Tyndall, stripped of scientific terms, reduced to the essential points, and set in the clear light of the understanding—explaining the author's belief in the vitality of two things: of universal matter and of religious sentiment. It was plain that he had been and was destined to be misunderstood on these points, and as they had never been so distinctly connected before by any man of scientific prominence, and as the connection involved the problem of Free Religion, it was worth while to take a just estimate of his thought and of its bearing upon the most important spiritual things. The misunderstanding would arise chiefly in that portion of the address which contrasted the old mechanical idea of a lifeless matter with the new idea which Tyndall espoused, that matter has eternally contained all the germs of all the things which have appeared, and all the forces needed to make them appear; that it was material and life in combination. Tyndall says that we are reduced to making a choice between two theories—one the old theory that everything has been created out of dead matter by successive acts of a live Creator, and the other that the universe is live matter in various forms and stages of development; that it has been from all eternity as alive; that the imagination cannot force itself back to a time when it was anything else than this, or something containing the latent forms and qualities of everything—all forms, no matter how different they appear now to human observation, having been involved originally in this eternal live substance.

In the concluding portion of his essay, Mr. Weiss said:—

"Free religion would set forth the path of knowledge to the unquenchable flames of the emotions. The nature and method of true science do nothing to constrain the human heart. On the contrary, it benefits by laying paths to concentrate and direct the all-pervading pulse, and send it flashing by the straightest lines upon its human errands. The soul of man is a unit, and when the heart feeds to the mind enthusiasm and emotion, the mind repays the generous subsidy with regulated beats in every vein. 'Not in each of these but in all is human nature whole,' says Tyndall, when he couples Newton and Shakspeare, Boileau and Raphael. They are not opposed, but supplemental; not mutually exclusive, but reconcilable. If religion can formulate and settle these mutual claims, she will at last justify the perseverance and the rest of centuries. Let us rejoice together in our noble discontent. 'It is perfectly possible for you and me,' says Tyndall, 'to purchase intellectual peace at the price of intellectual death. The world is not without refuges of this description, nor is it wanting in persons who seek their shelter and persuade others to do the same. I would exhort you to refuse such shelter, and to scorn such base repose; to accept, if the choice be forced upon you, commotion before stagnation.'

"May some electric sympathy from hearts in America, whom the truth would fain make free, overcome the distance of the Atlantic Ocean, and find a way to the heart of the great man who has spoken perhaps better than he knew, and with that thrill of contact put a girdle around the earth of the closest fellowship."

Mr. Elder was introduced, and spoke at some length. He said every one of us must be interested in the relations between science and religion. Science is affirming the impossibility of any other conception than that of the eternity of all there is. Science is affirming, too, that creation (not in the old sense of something being created out of nothing) is a process; not a mere event of which you may possibly get a glimpse by looking away back into the past, but a process going on in the world now no less than ever before. To me religion is this, a consciousness of the relation to us of a "not ourselves" that has existed from everlasting to everlasting. Call it what you please; call it God, call it Father, and you have not then expressed all the truth and all the significance. Religion, then, is our conscious relation to this; and this conscious relation is being made more accurate and more adequate by every discovery of science.

Mr. Abbot, following Mr. Elder, said: "If it be materialism to accept Tyndall's conclusions, I have been for years a materialist. But I do not look upon materialism as the true name for the bearings of his philosophy. It seems to me, if I can fathom his thought, or the drift of modern tendencies at all, that we are not coming to any system which will plant itself upon anything superficial—upon the mere phenomena of matter and of mind. There is a deeper philosophy upon which our thoughts must rest—the deeper fact of this one omnipresent energy appearing in different forms—two phases of the same fact, that is all. It is this underlying unity that is the solid ground upon which we must stand. We cannot rest upon that which is Phenomenal merely. We must rest upon that which is Substantial."

After further remarks by Col. Higginson and the President, the Convention was declared adjourned.

In making this brief and imperfect report, I wish to acknowledge my large indebtedness to the very full and excellent reports of the Providence Journal.

BOTH ALIKE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:

Dear Sir,—It is several years since I have sent a communication to your columns, but I venture to ask the favor of insertion for a brief one now.

In a recent "Brevity" you say: "The Free Religionists, as a body, are not theists. Although individual members are devout men and women, their Association neither affirms nor denies the existence of a God. This is one of their open questions; and avowed atheists are members of the Association, in good and regular standing."

This statement, I believe, is verbally correct in every particular, though so expressed as to suggest inferences which would be incorrect; and I do not quote it for the purpose of controverting it. I merely wish to call attention to the fact that the American Unitarian Association is in the same position as the Free Religious Association. The Free Religious Association does not affirm the existence of God; neither does the American Unitarian Association. The objects of the former, as stated in its Constitution, are "to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history." The object of the latter, as stated in its Constitution, is "to diffuse the knowledge and promote the interests of pure Christianity." Neither of the two Associations "affirms nor denies the existence of a God"; so far as positive collective utterance is concerned, they equally treat this as "an open question." If this reticence is a fault, they are equally to blame for it, and your "Brevity" would have been exactly as true, if it had read as follows:—

"The American Unitarian Association, as a body, are not theists. Although individual members are devout men and women, their Association neither affirms nor denies the existence of a God. This is one of their open questions."

It may be said that "pure Christianity" necessarily implies belief in God. I know one Unitarian minister, at least, in good and regular standing, who believes and publicly says that Christianity is compatible with atheism; and I have reason to believe that, whatever statement of belief in God might be adopted by any Unitarian organization, more than one such minister would reject it in private conversation. The Free Religious Association acts precisely like the American Unitarian Association, in adopting no formal statement of belief about God; and Unitarians should understand that they cannot afford to reproach the Free Religious Association with creedlessness, until they publish to the world a formal creed of their own. So long as they are willing to trust that free individual thought, without a formal collective creed, will lead to religious truth, why should not we do the same?

I am, with respect and friendship for yourself, and cordial good-will for all my former associates in the Unitarian ministry,

Yours for impartial justice,

Francis E. Abbot.

MR. ABBOT'S LETTER.

In another column our readers will find a communication from the editor of The Index, who was once our honored associate in the Unitarion ministry, and is still our valued and beloved friend. He admits that the Free Religionists, as a body, are not theists; that the existence of God is one of their open questions; and avowed Atheists are members of the Free Religious Association in good and regular standing; but he contends that the American Unitarian Association is equally untheistic. We will not stop to ask our neighbor why, if there is such unbounded liberty in the Unitarian Association, there was any need of organizing a no more creedless Free Religious Association, but will address ourselves directly to the point which he makes.

The whole weight of Mr. Abbot's argument rests upon the astounding assumption that "pure Christianity" does not imply a belief in the existence of a God! But both the voice of history and the common sense of Christendom are against him. Jesus Christ proclaimed and worshipped God, and so do all who are his followers. We never before heard of any Unitarian minister who "publicly says that Christianity is compatible with atheism," although we have known one who thought he had squared circles and invented a perpetual-motion machine. If a body is to be held responsible for all the crudities and absurdities of every individual member, the Free Religionists can easily be put in a woful plight. Ever since the Unitarian Association was organized its meetings have been opened with prayer, which expressed the theism always implied in "pure Christianity."

As soon as the Free Religious Association was organized, the Register suggested that the word "Religious" excluded atheists, but we were immediately informed, not by any obscure and eccentric member, but by chief leaders and representatives of the movement, that religion does not necessarily imply theism, and that the Free Religious Association includes atheists in its fellowship. When the President of the Free Religious Association was rebuked in the Investigator for saying, "We are not a group of godless materialists, disciples of Voltaire, or followers of Volney or Paine," etc., he hastened to explain away what had been called the "slurring or sneering" at atheists, and giving them "the cold shoulder," while The Index promptly declared that the Free Religious Association admitted "godless materialists just as cordially as godly Christians." It is also, we believe, a significant fact that no prayer has ever been heard at a meeting of the Free Religious Association. Indeed, the atheistic portion of its constituency would naturally feel wronged by anything of the kind in an assembly where the existence of a God is an open question.

When representative men of the Unitarian Association, including its chief officers, shall state that Christianity is compatible with atheism, besides omitting all devotional services at their meetings, and the Liberal Christian and Christian Register shall announce that godless materialists are admitted to our full and equal membership just as cordially as godly Christians, Mr. Abbot may succeed in his attempted flank movement; but not till then.—Christian Register.

The Index.

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY
BY THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,
AT
NO. 1 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.
Toledo Office: No. 35 Monroe Street. Julius T. Frey, Agent and Clerk.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

N. B.—No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

Francis Ellingwood Abbot, ... Editor.
Abram Walter Stevens, ... Associate Editor.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 5, 1874.

The Index will be sent to any name not now on our mail-list until January 1, 1876, on receipt of $3.00 in advance. Here is a chance to receive the paper for fourteen months at the price of twelve months. Please tell your friends and neighbors of this liberal offer, and help us to increase our circulation.

Mr. Morse's bust of Theodore Parker (the larger one, which is a great improvement on the smaller) has been very handsomely photographed. Copies are now for sale at the price of fifty cents, and will doubtless be very extensively purchased by the admirers of Parker's great and noble career. Address S. H. Morse, 25 Bromfield Street, or The Index.

By "philosophic instinct" we meant no "intuitional faculty" of any sort, but only that general bias of mind produced by the study of philosophy. Every mind thoroughly trained in philosophic method learns to seek for unity in all phenomena, and this demand for the one in the many becomes a constant element in all his mental action. Our correspondent R. P. T. need not apprehend that we are in danger of admitting any "intuitionalist" solution of the problem of Divine Being.

The Convention of the Free Religious Association at Providence was very successful. The evening sessions were largely attended, and the audiences in the forenoon and afternoon were quite respectable in point of numbers. The hospitalities of the place were very generously dispensed, and the local society left nothing undone to render the occasion pleasant to all concerned. A long, though condensed and therefore imperfect, report of the meetings will be found on another page of this issue.

Here is a bit of indigo Orthodoxy from Rev. W. M. Baker, who argues in the Independent of Oct. 15 that ministers are ambassadors "charged with the ultimatum of Heaven to men": "Our world is the Paris of a siege over the walls of which is no possible escape—a siege to end only when the city sinks at last in ashes, stormed, as Scripture assures us, by God with fire, as its closing catastrophe. For (and oceans of rose-water are useless to quench or conceal the fact) the war is between God and man. God is 'angry with the wicked.' 'The carnal mind is enmity with God,' and no degree of assertion to the contrary can change the actual fact. Yes, we are ambassadors between God and men, because there is war."

This statement is copied from the Boston Sunday Herald of October 25: "At the meeting of the Essex Conference of Liberal Christian Churches, held at the Unitarian Church at Lawrence, on Wednesday, Rev. J. T. Hewes read an essay, in which he said the Christian Church can fellowship none but Christians, Christians in character and Christians in belief. In the discussion which followed, Rev. J. H. Clifford, of North Andover, assented to the interpretation of Christianity in the essay, and therefore could not call himself a Christian, but the speakers generally thought Christianity did not imply sound doctrine as well as sound character." Truth finds now and then a faithful voice: alas for the welcome that too often greets it! We hope our brave young brother has counted the cost of his sincerity.

The Mathean Club of East Stoughton, Massachusetts, which had engaged Rev. Dr. Lorimer, a Baptist minister of this city, to lecture before them, have passed resolutions denouncing his action as "unjust, unchristian, and ungentlemanly" in refusing to fulfil his engagement. The alleged excuse for this refusal was that he had heard bad things of the Club, and that the father of its young President (Rev. E. F. Strickland) had withdrawn from the Baptist denomination; that the Club (which is simply a union of harmless young people) were "a lot of infidels, spiritualists, and free-thinkers of every description," "banded together to destroy the Baptist church in East Stoughton"! His place in the course was supplied by Col. Higginson—a fact which greatly lessens our commiseration for the Club in being deserted by Dr. Lorimer.

"Father Beeson" essentially changed the plan of action he had agreed to respecting a convention for sending delegates to the General Indian Council, and held some meetings in this city before we heard of them. As the conditions stated with his approval in our article were not fulfilled, we have not felt justified in turning over to him the money sent in response to it; and this has been returned. But it makes little difference, as one dollar from Dr. Job T. Dickins, of Newburyport, was the grand total sent to us! The kind Doctor is evidently the only one among our readers who has any "cash consideration" for the Indians. But Father Beeson may yet accomplish his object, which is a good one, in his own way; and we wish him all success in it. The above is not a flattering exhibit, but it has its ludicrous side, and we will make the most of that.

With certain Christian qualifications which we omit here, Dr. Bellows spoke a needed and right manly word, when he said at the Saratoga Conference: "The public sentiment is horribly demoralized. Those religions which distinguish between the emotional and moral are accountable for this state of things. We are to take our stand upon pure morals. If we could take that ground, and throw everything else to the dogs, we should have a basis for more effective work than we have ever done. Let us give up, if need be, what the people call religion, and stick to what they call morality. But we need not give up either." The reservation which Dr. Bellows went on to make in favor of "sound New Testament principles" seems to us unnecessary, because we think that Christianity is largely responsible for that very excess of emphasis on "the emotional" which he so pointedly rebukes. It is, and has always professed to be, a "religion of love," while what the world needs is a religion of intellect and conscience just as much as of love.

Such letters as we receive from some of our personally unknown friends would be enough to give confidence and courage to any one. One just received says: "Am a medical man, an earnest student of the masters of modern thought. The younger professional men in our country are nearly all rationalists. My friend Dr. —— is an earnest and influential free-thinker. He came out of the Baptist church. The first copy of The Index I sent him 'worked him up' considerably. After undergoing an extended course of reading, he became a convert to our cause, and bids fair to exert a deep influence. Mr. Abbot, you have no idea what 'influence' you exert over numbers of young men in America. You may often possibly feel your efforts are not appreciated. Such is not the case. The Index, without doubt, has the most intelligent audience in the land." This last statement is certainly "without doubt" in our own mind, if we are any judge of "intelligence." The ability betrayed by our Index correspondents is a constant source of pride and pleasure.

In these days the question is coming home to more than one young Unitarian minister in the depths of his own heart: "Can I let myself be classed publicly among Christian ministers, without tarnishing my own ideal of absolute truthfulness and honor? On the one hand are popularity and competency; on the other hand are exclusion and pecuniary distress; and it is simply the public acceptance or rejection of a name which is to decide between the two alternatives." This is the invisible coercion brought to bear to-day on many a conscience in the Unitarian ranks by the now irrevocably and honestly accepted policy of the denomination. For those who are made to feel it we have only the deepest and tenderest sympathy; no advice, certainly no misjudgment. Each soul must fight such battles as these alone. Martyrdom of the modern sort has no glory in it at all; but it has many a sting, and operates as ever to make heroes here and hypocrites there, though perhaps the heroism and the hypocrisy are unknown even to themselves.

A. J. DAVIS AND THE HYDE PARK LIBRARY.

Several months since, as is stated by the Norfolk County Gazette of October 17, Mr. A. E. Giles, one of our largest-hearted liberals, presented to the public library of Hyde Park, Massachusetts, a complete set of Andrew Jackson Davis' works, in nearly thirty volumes, with a request that they be placed upon the shelves for public use. The eleven Trustees of the Library could not agree either to accept or reject the dangerous gift, and, though meeting after meeting was held, this dead-lock continued. At the last meeting, a discussion of an hour and a half took place on the subject.

Rev. Mr. Davis thought that the books in question were "the most useless reading" he had ever known, and "could not conscientiously vote against them, as they amounted to nothing anyway."

Mr. Weld, the chairman, favored the admission of any moral work, no matter how extreme the ism it advocated. He bore testimony to the unspotted character of Mr. A. J. Davis, and said he had recently noticed a card of thanks for a donation of his works to the Chelsea Library. He should vote to accept Mr. Giles' present.

Rev. Mr. Davis said that Rev. Mr. Williams thought the books "too silly to be wicked."

Rev. Mr. Gilbert read extracts from the Morning Lectures to show their "general tendency toward atheism and blasphemy and ridicule of sacred things." Their influence was "corrupting," and so forth. He would not vote to admit such books.

Mr. Lancaster would vote to admit them, as there was much in them to "instruct and elevate the mind."

Mr. Nott considered them "profitless reading," but some of them were "corrupting."

Father Corcoran decidedly opposed them, as improper for any library, public or private. "They denied the divinity of Christ, and their whole tendency pointed directly to atheism and materialism." They should not be admitted by any official act of his, because they tended to "lower the moral nature and bring it down to final wreck."

It was finally voted to accept the Harbinger of Health, the Book of Wise Words, and various other works of Mr. Davis; but his Morning Lectures and Autobiography were unanimously rejected. As the rule of the Trustees now stands, a majority of negative votes is required to reject any book donated, though until this meeting three negative votes sufficed.

A private letter on this subject informs us that the Rev. Messrs. Davis, Gilbert, Williams, and Corcoran are ministers respectively of the Orthodox (Congregationalist), Baptist, Unitarian, and Catholic churches in Hyde Park. It was thus the local clergy that are responsible for this delicious bit of Philistinism. To quote the excellent suggestion of this letter: "The true ground, as I suppose it to be, is that not a majority, nor even the whole, of the committee can equitably reject a lawful book donated to the library, while there is room for it. Under this rule unlawful books (i.e., obscene ones) might be excluded. Such a rule, requiring the free admission of all lawful books, would prevent the bickering and sectarian conflicts which now frequently agitate library Boards. Of course, it is in reference to public libraries, supported in whole or in part by taxation of all the inhabitants and their property, that I suppose my rule to apply. There are many town or public libraries in Massachusetts [and elsewhere] whose committees or trustees are often quarrelling over the admission of books, not knowing what the sound democratic principle of admission is."

The position here taken by our correspondent is unquestionably correct in principle. What right have any trustees to constitute themselves censors of the press, and strain out heresy from public libraries which heretics are taxed to support? It is a monstrous usurpation of authority on their part; and this case only brings it out in all its insufferableness. The moral influence of Andrew Jackson Davis' works, so far as we know them, is irreproachably pure, whatever opinions may be entertained of Spiritualism; and it is a disgrace to the State that proceedings worthy only of the "Sacred Congregation of the Index" should take place in it. One moral we draw from them which is patent: the absurdity of electing clergymen (and the Unitarian clergyman in this instance certainly showed himself more supercilious than liberal) to sit in judgment on what the public ought to read, and what not. We advise all our readers who may have occasion to vote for trustees of public libraries to cast their ballots for men broad-minded enough to act on the rule above suggested with regard to admission of books. The clergy are put forward too generally on library committees and school committees, when what is really wanted is a degree of intelligence and freedom from sectarian bias which are seldom found in their profession. Teachers, doctors, lawyers, well-educated business men, and men of general culture, are far better custodians of such interests as these than men who are "suckled on a creed outworn." It is time to put competency to deal with the things of this world in charge of this world's interests, chief of which is the providing the intellectual diet and training for the community at large; while the clergy may be left to preside over salvation and damnation —points of small interest to most men.

A LOGICAL BOOMERANG.

The Christian Register criticises the Free Religious Association because, "as a body," they "are not theists," and "neither affirm nor deny the existence of a God." Although probably a majority of the Association are individually theists, it is true that, "as a body," they are neither theists nor atheists; their Constitution says nothing on the subject, but emphatically declares the principle of unlimited freedom of thought. Now it is a curious but indisputable fact that the Constitution of the American Unitarian Association is just as silent as that of the Free Religious Association on the question of theism; it simply professes "pure Christianity," and leaves every one to interpret this for himself. Rev. S. P. Putnam, a Unitarian minister in "good and regular standing," and a frequent contributor to the Liberal Christian, publicly took the position in THE INDEX of June 4 that an atheist may be a Christian. This he had a perfect right to do by the Constitution of the American Unitarian Association, which says nothing whatever against an atheistic view of Christianity. The editor of the Register tries to escape from this uncomfortable fact, which tells just as strongly against the American Unitarian Association as against the Free Religious Association, by appealing to the implication of theism contained in the word Christianity. Certainly; we agree with him in the opinion that the word properly implies theism. But that is merely his and our private opinion, which is nowhere santioned by the Constitution of the American Unitarian Association. Any atheist can join that Association, if he happens to share Mr. Putnam's opinion; and the Association cannot help themselves, until they define their Christianity as theistic only. They content themselves with a mere implication of theism, which implication any one of their members may reject as Mr. Putnam has done, without forfeiting fellowship or losing any right connected with it; and the Association are powerless to discipline him or disfellowship him. They stickle only for a name, and a name is all they get.

Now our point is altogether too clear to be escaped by evasion of any sort. If the Unitarians mean to make theism a test of membership, they must not flinch to say so in their Constitution; they must not be afraid of formal creeds or statements of belief. Otherwise they are precisely as much exposed as the Free Religious Association to the Register's reproaches. An informal creed of a pretty definite kind is contained in the preamble of the National Conference, and that is why we left it; but there is none in the Constitution of the Unitarian Association except the bare word Christianity. So long as one of their accepted ministers, one of the recognized contributors to their denominational literature, is allowed to say publicly, and unrebuked, that Christianity is compatible with atheism, they cannot appeal to the alleged theistic implication of the word Christianity without exciting a smile. The fact is that the Unitarians are merely playing at organization; they organize, yet break all the laws of organization. The Register puts itself in a comical position, while it cavils at the strictly logical and self-consistent position of the Free Religious Association; and the whole purpose of these comments is to call its attention to the chaotic state of its own principles, which forbid creeds, yet cannot dispense with them notwithstanding. If belief in God ought to be verbally and collectively affirmed, why does not the American Unitarian Association affirm it? But if otherwise, why carp at the Free Religious Association for omitting to affirm it? One would think this a tolerably plain dilemma; and we leave the Register to select the horn of its choice at leisure. There is no "flank movement" intended on our part; we have little knowledge of military manœuvres, and little respect for the strategist by profession. What we do intend is to bring home to the Register, if possible, the unreasonableness, inconsistency, and absurdity of blaming the Free Religious Association for having no theistic creed, until the American Unitarian Association has a theistic creed of its own to show. The Register is not wise to make reproaches which are forcible in no mouth but that of a creed-bound bigot; it will not do to talk of "implications," when these implications do not bind any one to anything. If the Register wants to reap the practical advantages of a creed, let it honestly demand one; but if it prefers to escape the disadvantages of a creed, let it as honestly omit to claim its advantages.

MR. HALE'S EULOGIUM OF THE CHURCH.

At a recent meeting in Boston for the purpose of raising $200,000 to erect a new building for the Medical College, Rev. E. E. Hale considered "the existence of the medical profession as the noblest visible result of Christian institutions," and pointed to "hospitals and similar institutions, and to the daily work of physicians," as "a triumph of the Christian Church." Mr. Hale is too modest by half. The discovery of the magnetic needle was first announced in the Sermon on the Mount; the telescope was invented by Matthew, the microscope by Mark, the spectroscope by Luke, the ophthalmoscope by John, and the scope of Mr. Hale's puff of the Church by Zaccheus, who climbed a tree, and saw further than anybody until this new Zaccheus climbed the pinus ingens of Unitarian rhetoric; the use of money was introduced by Peter, who took the primordial nickel cent out of a fish's mouth to pay the first tax-bill, while an irredeemable currency was first issued by Judas, after he had made himself irredeemable by his bad conduct and his foolish financial operation of throwing away the thirty pieces of silver; Paul invented printing to save time in his voluminous correspondence, built the first railroad to Damascus (though he cautioned King Agrippa against his own "bonds"), established the first steamboat line between Cæsarea and Rome, took a patent from Nero for the first horse-car, laid the first Atlantic cable to keep up communication with Columbus, whom he despatched with strict instructions not to fail to discover America, and closed a brief but honorable career as a member of the Royal Society of London by inventing the turbine-wheel, nitro-glycerine, etherization, bills of exchange, and Darwinism. By wilfully suppressing these and innumerable other facts of like importance, Mr. Hale exposes himself (very unjustly, as we believe) to a popular suspicion of plotting to overthrow Christianity by "damning it with faint praise." We shall look anxiously for the next number of Old and New, hoping to find in it a full recognition of the merit of Christianity as the originator of Greek philosophy and art, Roman jurisprudence, and early Egyptian civilization, as well as the "triumph of the Christian Church" in having established the solar system on a sound basis by its sagacious vote at the Nicene Council.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—"Church Congress" has this week been offering its annual modicum of fun and nonsense for the amusement of the British public during the recess.

I cannot possibly make to pass before the eyes of your readers all the comical scenes of this ecclesiastical pantomime; but there are one or two points in the debates worth noticing as signs of the times; for, in spite of what the dissenters may say, the Church of England does, and will for some time to come, set the gauge for religious opinion and sentiment to the country at large.

We had amongst other things a debate on missions, during which the President (I believe) spoke of the success of the Christian missionaries among the Jews in such terms as to impress any one utterly ignorant of the facts with the idea that the ancient people were being rapidly converted to the faith of the Nazarene.

The speaker was evidently laboring under the delusion that he was speaking the truth, and one can only suppose that he had been crammed with statistics from Palestine Place, where the conversion of Jews to Christianity is being carried on at the rapid rate of three and one-half Jews per annum, and at the cost of several thousand pounds sterling!

One feature in these conversions is that the same Jew gets converted over and over again at intervals, according to the state of his finances or the growth of his beard. But such incidents are not worth mentioning in any discussion about missions; the object in view being merely to elicit contributions from generous and gullible Christian ladies, to whom any suggestion of misappropriation of funds would be untimely.

Having got through the missionary business, the next day the Congress tackled the question of convocation—to be or not to be,—and if "to be," how was it to be constituted, with or without laymen?

It need hardly be told that this subject divided the wolves and the lambs as suddenly and effectually as St. Paul's hint about the resurrection directed from himself the attention of his accusers.

The Low-Church party, whom I venture to call the "lambs," voted for the admission of the laity, while of course the High Church voted for their exclusion. The value of an opinion on either side is not worth very much in itself, when only clergy are interested in the discussion; but in this instance the choice of a side is indeed of the greatest importance. If this year's Church Congress had done no other good, it would be invaluable for having elicited the radical opposition between the sacerdotalists and the genuine Protestants in the Church.

There was no mistake about the anxiety of the former to keep in their own hands every vestige and even every pretence of power, while it was equally clear on the other hand that the evangelicals desired above all things to resist and defeat this supremacy of clergy by the introduction of the lay element into the Lower House of Convocation.

There was very nearly a row over it, and storms of cheers and counter-cheers greeted the sentiment of Canon Fremantle, who thanked God that we had "a Protestant Queen, and a Protestant Prime Minister;" and that "the people of this country would neither be Pope-ridden nor priest-ridden."

Upon the whole, the sacerdotalists got the worst of it; and if the Low-Church party can be only kept at the proper temperature of zeal and discretion, they may yet be able to counteract the subtle machinations of the High Churchmen. Altogether, this episode about laymen in convocation was the most sensible piece of discussion which clerics have given us for long enough; though it is to be regretted that the debate wound up by an enumeration of the priceless benefits which that body had conferred upon the Church, thus turning our feeling of respect once more into that of ridicule.

Convocation—as Archdeacon Bickersteth assures us — has actually "affirmed the principles of the Athanasian Creed" (in spite of the Archbishop of Canterbury's saying that neither himself nor any of the bishops present believed in the damnatory clauses thereof)! Convocation had "repudiated the Vatican councils"!

Convocation had "presented us with a new Lectionary"! "For what we have received"—the Lord alone, in this case, could make us "truly thankful," and then only by an African typhoon!

Can we wonder? Churches are like mountains, often in labor, and everlastingly presenting the expectant world with a mouse.

After some more sparring between High and Low on the subject of church architecture and decoration, the Congress betook itself to the momentous question of "Scepticism"; and when I give you verbatim, as recorded in the Times, the opening remarks of Canon Westcott—risum teneatis, if you can.

"Sceptical criticism. . . . failed to comprehend the nature of the problem to be discussed; it failed to take into account the accumulation of various facts in favor of Christianity, and also failed to appreciate the exact religious character of those facts. Christianity was the historical proclamation of an event which had changed man's whole relations; yet sceptical critics made no effort to understand that history. They occupied themselves with literary fragments, and not with vital realities."

"The synoptical gospels," he went on to maintain, "and the gospel of St. John, afforded unimpeachable proof of their authenticity, while the resurrection of Christ, a fact unique in itself, and followed by a new life, standing as it did alone, solitary and unapproachable in its conception, left," he maintained, "to no one who brought to the subject the spirit of an impartial inquirer room to doubt as to the Divine origin of our Christian belief." (The italics are mine).

Your readers can imagine the solos and chorus of twaddle that would be required to keep in tune with this keynote. Dr. Hayman, the late Head-master of Rugby, managed to come to the front with the most offensive speech of the day, in which he bracketed for condemnation Dr. Arnold, Richard Congreve, and the Dean of Westminster, whose name, however, he had not the shamefacedness to mention, and whom he designated as one "who was popular everywhere, from the costly cathedral to the dissenting chapel."

In my childhood, I used to sing a comical old song, I think from the Beggar's Opera:—

"Pray, Goody, please to moderate
The rancor of your tongue;
Remember, where the judgment's weak,
The prejudice is strong."

I should like to have sung it at the Church Congress of 1874. Very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

IN THE CONFESSIONAL.

It had been one of my discouraged days, such as come to all of us; my spirits were depressed because of evils which confronted me and for which I knew no remedy; and when, near the close of the evening church service to which I had accompanied my friends Christine and Gloriana, the choir sang with impressiveness the old-fashioned words, "Jesus, lover of my soul," to the air of Pleyel's Hymn, the heart-clouds seemed to grow blacker, and culminated at last in a rainfall of silent, irrepressible tears. The pathetic cry of the hymn seemed to me, for that moment, the expression of my own long-repressed cry for other than human help. I, too, longed to say—

"Other refuge have I none;
Hangs my helpless soul on thee;
Leave, O leave me not alone,
Still support and comfort me!"

It was one of the moments in which I hated my own intellectual conclusions, which denied me so inexorably these comforting appeals for extraneous help—one of the moments in which "to be without God in the world" was indeed a heart-break and despair. The sermon had been on God's providence; and the preacher had made an earnest appeal, in chaste, refined, and glowing language, to the need felt by every human soul in its hours of sorest need for a Divine Helper and Care-Taker. Yet through my tears and my sorrowful enjoyment of the sweet old hymn, I was oddly conscious of Christine's guarded scrutiny of me. I could read in her clear hazel eyes the half-glad suspicion and hope which my unusual softness of mood had awakened in her mind. And I was, too, as plainly conscious of Gloriana's complete absorption in the music and the hymn. Her dusky eyes were luminous with tender light, between her parted lips no breath seemed to come, while her fine, expressive face was pale with depth of emotion.

No word was said, however, by any of us, until we reached the home of Christine, where we had arranged to spend the night together. The fire burned low in the grate, and the gas was half turned off as we entered the sitting-room.

"Well," said Christine, as she essayed to turn on a brighter jet of light, "we are a silent trio. Did Pleyel's Hymn strike you, too, dumb, Gloriana?"

Gloriana caught her upraised hand.

"Don't," she said, "turn on more gas—that is, if you want any confessions from me. This semi-darkness is just the right light to talk by, and I want to talk to-night."

Christine threw some fresh coal on the grate, and we wheeled our chairs up near the fire, for the autumnal chill without made a little warmth inside desirable. Gloriana's cheeks had got back their roses now, and she gave a little laugh as she curled herself in the ample depths of a luxurious easy-chair. Christine's eyes, full of grave thought, sought hers questioningly.

"I laughed," explained Gloriana, "to think what creatures of moods and impulses we are. Here, half an hour ago listening to that wailing hymn, I felt myself at once to be in the depths of despairing doubt and the heights of ecstatic belief. I not only was ready to say, 'Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian,' but I almost persuaded myself that I was a Christian; and, in spite of creeds and dogmas to which I cannot yield assent, felt that God was indeed my father and my refuge from life's storms. But now, sitting here so comfortably, I have no longer any of that feeling."

"And you?" said Christine, turning to me, "You too felt God's power in that sermon and in that hymn?"

"You saw my tears, Christine," I replied, "and wish to know what moved me—hardened doubter as you think me—to such unwonted emotion. I will tell you honestly. It was because I had no longer any father in heaven. I have been obliged to give up my belief in the tender Over-Heart which to you seems so sure and safe a refuge, and I wept because of my orphanage."

"'Sad losses have we met,
But thine is heavier yet,
For a believing heart hath gone from thee,'" murmured Gloriana, slightly misquoting.

"Say not that you are an orphan," Christine said earnestly, "but rather that you have wilfully made yourself an alien from your father's house. Why may you not say, as so many others like you have said, 'I will arise and go unto my father'? You cannot guess, dear friend, how your infidelity distresses and perplexes me. How, with your really religious and reverential nature, your sympathy with the good and true, your high aims, your appreciation of the loftier virtues—in direct contradiction of all this, you came to turn your back upon Christianity with all its high, holy, and loving promises, and its refined ministration to your intellectual needs, to accept the dry husks of a coarse and hard materialism, is something I cannot understand."

"Under what seems to you the 'dry husks of a coarse and hard materialism,'" I replied, "I find the substantial grain called truth, Christine; and although I confess a taste for the toothsome confectionary and tempting whipped-syllabub which the Church deals out so lavishly to her children, yet I have learned from experience that such food soon cloys the appetite and debilitates the system. I find I need stronger, more nourishing, if less tempting food. I own that the Church offers me inducements to return to her fold which tempt me sorely, which I refuse—as to-night, for instance—with tears of agonized self-denial. I would like to believe in a father-God, who would take a tender personal cognizance of my little needs and doings; to whom I could apply in the hour of suffering with perfect assurance of instant help. I would like some Divine Being to ease me of my burdens when they bear too heavily upon me. I would like the brotherly and sisterly companionship of pure, true men and women; I would like to join hands with them in the prevention of crime and suffering. I would like the ecstacy of an exalted religious hope and joy. I would like the assurance of a joyous, painless immortality. That is what the Church promises; but it fails of its promise to those who insist on keeping their judgment clear from the delusions of a blind, unquestioning faith. It is not because I wish, but because conscience and reason compel, that I give up the Church. There was a choice of sacrifices offered me; the needs of the hour forced upon me either a sacrifice of all these sweet religious associations, or a sacrifice of my individuality and exercise of reason. I made my choice of sacrifices understandingly, and I have never regretted it. If I sometimes look back longingly, it is never falteringly. There is much to me in Christianity that is good, but there is more in free thought that is better, stronger, loftier. It is a remnant of the old Christian cowardliness and weakness which makes me even for a moment wish to shirk life's troubles and hide myself in some stronger arms 'till the storm of life be past.' Freedom gives strength, and added strength is always added power."

"I like to hear you talk like that, Amie," assented Gloriana; "and when you are thrown upon the defensive in these encounters with our lay-priestess Christine, and assume as now the enthusiasm of a martyr for opinion's sake, I am almost tempted to declare myself on your side; for you know that I believe nearly as little as you do of creeds and dogmas. And since we are in the confessional, I might as well admit that it is the entire and thorough respectability of the Church which still keeps me a hanger-on just outside the palings, but near enough to hide myself in the protecting folds of its robes of ultra-respectability. And then, whenever, growing tired of the tread-mill round of unreasoning, all-absorbing faith which the Church requires of its devotees, I begin to cast longing glances toward the dusty, exciting, breezy whirl of discussion and discarding made by you image-breakers, I am repelled from joining you because of the heterogeneous, repulsive, reform-run-man crowd around you, whose vagaries you are bound to respect and sanction."

"And whose vagaries," I answer, "have ever a right to be respected and sanctioned, so they do not interfere, or attempt to interfere, with the rights or happiness of others. There is always a grain of truth, Gloriana, at the bottom of the wildest of these vagaries, and we should ever be ready to give these crude discoveries a propelling push in the right direction. In the Christian fold there is also a large class of 'heterogeneous and repulsive' Christians; but you divide yourself into sects which you label Episcopal, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Adventist, etc., and it is quite well understood by even outsiders that some of these hold no communion with the others; yet you are all Christians. So the Free-thinkers are already dividing into congenial groups and labelling themselves, or being labelled, Free Religionists, Positivists, Materialists, Rationalists, Spiritualists, etc. You all work together for Christ; we all work together for humanity. The Christian's aim is to bring men to feel entire dependence on Christ; the Freethinker's aim is to make men entirely self-dependent."

"I am tired of discussion for to-night," said Christine wearily, and a little sadly; "let us have some music, Gloriana."

And Gloriana went to the piano, and played Pleyel's Hymn; and when she sung her voice seemed a little sad as well as defiant.

METHODISM AND SLAVERY.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Now that the agency of the Presbyterian Church, through the influence of "The Two Hodges," in promoting slavery and producing the rebellion, has been shown up in THE INDEX (October 8) by "an ex-Presbyterian minister," will not some ex-Methodist minister, through THE INDEX, show the influence that the Methodist Church exerted in the same direction? not forgetting to mention the famous New York Conference of 1844, when Bishop Andrews was deposed for holding slaves contrary to the Discipline; and the Southern delegates, exasperated at being beaten in a six weeks' contest, in which they defended slavery from the Bible, went home swearing vengeance on the Methodist Church North, declaring that the dividing wedge had entered the Methodist Church, and that they would never rest till they had not only split the Church, but the Union also; which threat they faithfully fulfilled by stirring up the pro-slavery politicians, and causing the division of the Church and the rebellion, though not the destruction of the Union, which they had predicted and striven for.

Who will say, after knowing these facts, that these two Churches, the Presbyterian and Methodist, had no more to do in causing the rebellion than all the pro-slavery politicians, North and South, combined?

Will not some one write it up, and detail the facts, so that the honor of the deed may go down into church history, and there be embalmed forever? Does Parker Pillsbury know?

ELLA E. GIBSON.

BARRE, Mass., October 9.

WHAT WAS SLAVERY?

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Your excellent correspondent, in a recent article celebrating "The Two Hodges," gave so full an exposition of the character and conduct of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church on the subject of slavery, and its subsequent penalties on the nation, as to leave no room nor need for me to refer to it. And I will only say that there was a day when even American Presbyterianism was not so "totally depraved" on the sin of slavery as it afterwards became under the corrupting culture of "the two Hodges" and the like of them. For instance, back so far as 1793, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church—

"Resolved, That we do highly approve the general principles in favor of Universal Liberty which prevail in America, and the interest which many of the States have taken in promoting the abolition of slavery. They earnestly recommend it to all the members in their communion, to give those persons who are at present held in servitude such good education as to prepare them for the better enjoyment of freedom.... And finally, they recommend to all their people to use the most prudent measures, consistent with the interest and state of civil society in the countries where they live, to procure, eventually, the final abolition of slavery in America."

The second annunciation of the sentiments of the General Assembly was made in 1794. Their sentiment at that time was appended to a note to the one hundred and forty-second question of the larger Catechism, on the eighth commandment, in these words:—

"1 Tim. 1: 10. The law is made for man-stealers. This crime among the Jews exposed the perpetrators of it to capital punishment: Exodus 21: 16; and the apostle here classes them with sinners of the first rank. The word he uses, in its original import, comprehends all who are concerned in bringing any of the human race into slavery, or in retaining them in it. Hominum fures, qui servos vel liberos abducunt, retinent, vendunt, vel emunt. Stealers of men are all those who bring off slaves or freemen, and keep, sell, or buy them. To steal a freeman, says Grotius, is the highest kind of theft. In other instances, we only steal human property, but when we steal or retain men in slavery, we seize those who, in common with ourselves, are constituted, by the original grant, lords of the earth. Gen. 1: 28."

In 1818, the General Assembly made a lengthy report of its views and wishes on the subject of slavery, of which the following are excerpts:—

"We consider the voluntary enslaving of one part of the human race by another as a gross violation of the most precious and sacred rights of human nature; as utterly inconsistent with the law of God.... Slavery creates a paradox in the moral system—it exhibits rational, accountable, and immortal beings in such circumstances as scarcely to leave them the power of moral action. It exhibits them as dependent on the will of others whether they shall receive religious instruction; whether they shall know and worship the true God; whether they shall enjoy the ordinances of the gospel; whether they shall perform the duties and cherish the endearments of husbands and wives, parents and children, neighbors and friends; whether they shall preserve their chastity and purity, or regard the dictates of justice and humanity. Such are some of the consequences of slavery; consequences not imaginary, but which connect themselves with its very existence.... From this view of the consequences resulting from the practice into which Christian people have most inconsistently fallen, of enslaving a portion of their brethren of mankind, it is manifestly the duty of all Christians, when the inconsistency of slavery with the dictates of humanity and religion has been demonstrated, and is generally seen and acknowledged, to use their honest, earnest, and unwearied endeavors, as speedily as possible to efface this blot on our holy religion, and to obtain the complete abolition of slavery throughout the world. We earnestly exhort them" (the slave-holders) "to continue and to increase their exertions to effect a total abolition of slavery."

Such was the estimate Presbyterianism put upon slavery before the epoch of the Hodges. When they became the educators of its ministers and doctors of divinity, the Church began to correct its mistakes; and in less than twenty years the "Harmony Presbytery" of South Carolina, unrebuked, passed the following, in solemn conclave met, in solemn form; with prayer to open, prayer to close:—

"2. Resolved, That slavery has existed from the days of those good old slave-holders and patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (who are now in the kingdom of heaven), to the time when the apostle Paul sent a runaway home to his master Philemon, and wrote a Christian and fraternal letter to this slave-holder, which we find still stands in the canon of the Scriptures—and that slavery has existed ever since the days of the apostle, and does now exist."

Such did slavery become under the tuition and the tutelage of "the two Hodges" and their reverend confrères to whom was committed the education of the ministers and teachers of the Presbyterian Church of our Northern and Southern States.

The consequences of such teaching, your correspondent to whom I referred at the beginning of this letter did but begin to describe. The cataclysm of blood and fire which burst at Fort Sumter and overspread the South was a part of it. Only part. The end is not yet. I close by saying once more, Here is Christianity, self-interpreted, self-illustrated, self-illumined. Here is Christianity, judged, not by its bark, nor its blossoms, but by its fruits. And whoso readeth, let him understand.

THE CONTRADICTION.

MR. EDITOR:—

In a copy of what purports to be the new Constitution of Pennsylvania I find the following: "No man can of right be compelled to support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry, against his consent."

I would like to ask whether church property is exempt from taxation in Pennsylvania; and, if so, whether every man in that State consents thus to support places of worship. Yours, Q.

[1. To the best of our knowledge and belief, church property is exempted from taxation in Pennsylvania.

2. There is no reason to suppose that in that State "every man" consents to pay taxes indirectly for the support of the churches. Probably many submit to do this under protest, there as here.

3. It is coming to be generally perceived that exemption of the churches from taxation is indirect taxation of the community for the churches. The contradiction pointed out by "Q." exists in nearly all the States. Either the principle of religious liberty or the practice of church-exemption must be consciously disowned. This is one of the numerous issues between Christianity and freedom which still await a practical settlement; and it is the object of the Liberal League to see that they are settled rightly. How any one can fail to see an "object" and "plan" for radical organization, so long as these issues are unsettled, is a standing mystery to many minds.—ED.]

INDEXIANA.

MR. EDITOR:—

Your journal comes to my address regularly, and I read each copy with much interest. I was a constant reader of the Liberal Christian for many years; but stopped that paper for THE INDEX, and find it, in the sphere of religion and philosophy, to accord with my views better than any other journal I know at present published. Your essay on "Scientific Ethics" is really a good one, and marks out a course for future development in that department that will give a scientific basis to morality. Mr. Potter's discourse on "Religion and the Science of Religion" is also a remarkably fine production.

Now, while I gladly acknowledge my full sympathy with your efforts to give a scientific basis to religion, cultivate a spirit of toleration to all persons, and cherish a sympathy with all who sincerely desire to discover the truth and substitute "love for hate, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, knowledge for ignorance," I cannot approve of the article of one of your co-editors, Richard P. Hallowell, who resorts to the old method of impeachment, malediction, and opprobrious epithets in answer to the Nation on the "Civil Rights Bill." No good can flow from such a method of discussion. It is time for intellectual and morally cultivated persons to ascend a plane above the muddy waters of bigotry and sectarianism.

What the world really wants to make progress in is correct knowledge. Religion, politics, social science, and man's relation to the world in which he lives, are all questions of the highest significance to human welfare. Science alone can give a true interpretation of them, and eliminate the errors and mysticisms that have always environed these subjects. Science has corrected the errors of religion from time immemorial, and accomplished much since the primitive condition of man, and much yet is to be achieved.

The theologian claims inspiration from heaven, and a first recognition from man for his message as infallible authority. To correct this error, the friends of free inquiry should invoke the aid of science to ascertain man's true relation to the world and source of all being. The same is true in the realm of politics. Theories, however brilliant, which have not the basis of scientific data, should not be urged upon the popular will; and the cry of equality will not settle questions of grave import in the political issues of the day. The great question of the relation of distinct races of men, to live in juxtaposition harmoniously in this country, can only be settled by science. A conscientious and scientific study of Ethnology will afford more light on this question than a thousand discourses on the ideal beatitudes of equality.

The history of the human species discloses the fact that there is no absolute equality among them. It is only a relative position that each race holds with regard to others; and the civilization of each race accords with this fact. Experience has discovered the necessity of adopting laws in accordance with Nature and the exigencies of each race.

The three discourses made at the last May meeting of the Free Religious Association, on the true relation of Free Religion to Christianity, are all marked with a generous spirit. Mr. Calthrop's address, however, is so far toned down that hardly any Christian in the world can discover any essentially Christian doctrine in it. Your discourse meets the issue more distinctly. I think you are right in saying that the Christian world has made the interpretation of Christianity for us; and it is this interpretation that is particularly valueless, in the light of modern science, as an infallible method of human regeneration. It makes human activities useless, unless an entire consecration to another is acknowledged as the only source of religious and moral enlightenment. Substitution becomes the only medium of salvation. The evolution of the human faculties to their full fruition, as achieved by human agency through obedience to strictly natural laws, is not recognized.

Mr. Higginson's discourse is marked by a free and easy style; but he thinks we cannot spare Christianity yet. Well, this is accommodating. But the question will ever recur by way of criticism, Why cherish and revere an institution that is founded in erroneous conceptions of human nature? The Christianity of the Church has been tried over eighteen hundred years, and failed to produce fruit in proportion to its claims. The practical and rational teachings of Jesus have, however, saved the Church from utter ruin, notwithstanding the domination of ecclesiastical authority over the human soul. I have yet to learn that the most essentially rationalistic teachings of Jesus constitute ecclesiastical Christianity.

While I am in full accord with your journal in the domain of religion, free inquiry, etc., I do not fellowship your political bias. I claim to be a Jeffersonian Democrat of the old type, but hope to cultivate a generous spirit of toleration on all the great questions at issue in our political life. A. M. S.

TYNDALL VERSUS GUIZOT ON THE DARK AGES.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Will you allow an "unlettered sceptic" to call attention to what pantheists and atheists ought to regard as one of Guizot's claims to distinction; one which has not been recognized, though set forth by J. S. Mill, and which will not, I suspect, be recognized in any of the notices of Guizot's death,—his efforts to secure a correct reputation for the eminent pantheists of the Dark or Middle Ages (fifth to the twelfth century), and to refute the vile generalizations of Brucker, Mosheim, and Hallam, who asperse the whole populations of France, Germany, and Italy, by declaring that these were ages of barbarism, ignorance, and the grossest superstitions, of which the tenth century by way of eminence is styled "the age"; and that all was the result of "the jargon of a fanatical, fraudulent, and mystical philosophy"—a Christian pantheism—a modification of Alexandrine pantheism, taught in the fifth century by the so-called Dionysius the Areopagite, and in the latter half of the ninth by John Scotus Erigena?

Attention ought to be called to these aspersions because they are endorsed by Professor Tyndall in his late address; he says that the spirit which existed "during the drought of the Middle Ages . . . . was a menial spirit; . . . thought had become abject; . . . mere authority led, as it always does in science, to intellectual death; . . . while an exercise of the phantasy, almost as degrading as that of modern Spiritualism," prevailed. "Intellectual immobility was the result." This may be true as to scientific thought, but Guizot showed that philosophic thought had not been brought under the complete vassalage of the doctrines of the Roman Church in the tenth century, and that it was not until the thirteenth century that a certain general conformity was gradually effected after violent struggles. Guizot says: "One is highly astonished at the false idea which has been formed that this epoch was one of apathy and moral sterility in which intellect was without development or power."

You say that Tyndall is "confusing the public mind by reiterating Spencer's meaningless jargon" about the philosophy of ignorance; and that "the unutterable shallowness of this Spencerian philosophy of the Unknowable, now so fashionable, is the intellectual disgrace of the age." If this be so, and as the "philosophy of ignorance" on like matters was taught by Dionysius and Scotus, and was rendered fashionable by the support of the Emperor of the Romans, in the face of the Bishop of Rome, Tyndall ought not to say that the Middle Ages were more "dark" than the present age. Guizot complains of the want of impartiality in the historians of the Dark Ages; and the credibility of his complaint and his qualifications for an historian are supported by the testimony of the writer of the notice of his death in the New York Tribune, who says that he was remarkable for "conscientious research, veracity of illustration, and solid argument"; and that his efforts, in his Lectures on Civilization in the Sorbonne (1828–30), surpassed those of his colleague, Cousin, in exhibiting "a solid judgment, ripe comprehensiveness, and lucid force of expression." The writer says that Guizot was a rigid and uncompromising disciple of the Reformed Church, the Calvinistic principles of which were "so congenial to his nature" that he accepted them as embodying "the essence of truth," and "never outgrew their influence." Yet, what is remarkable, this Calvinist combined in his Lectures the Protestant element of religion with that of Free Religion. The most radical member of the Free Religious Association has not uttered stronger sentiments in favor of Free Religion than Guizot has. For instance: "When our conscience, our thoughts, our intellectual existence are at stake, to give up the government of oneself, to deliver over one's very soul to the government of a stranger, is a moral suicide a thousand times worse than bodily servitude."

Guizot's "broad generalizations" respecting the Roman Catholic Church (in which he declares that she has always exerted a baneful influence, and showed herself as the interpreter of civil and religious despotism, whenever the question of securities between power and liberty were debated) are "supplemented by careful qualification." He says the Roman Church in her weakness sheltered herself under the absolute power of the Roman Emperors, and in her strength claimed absolute power under the name of spiritual power. In the fifth century she had attained the summit of her ambition, had become the Church of the Roman Empire, in which temporal and spiritual powers were combined; had vanquished paganism, seized its temples, and suppressed the principal heresies. After the fall of the empire she had to encounter new pagans, and was surrounded by barbarian kings and chieftains with feelings and traditions opposed to her. She endeavored to re-establish the empire, and similar relations with it to those which had previously existed, by inviting some one of the barbarian kings to become emperor. The bishops and priests of the fifth and sixth centuries, failing to accomplish this object, and seeing the rude chiefs interfering in the affairs of the Church, by seizing its wealth, nominating to bishoprics, and appropriating slices of its territory, had not any other means of defence than to separate the spiritual from the temporal power. So they declared that religious belief ought not to be under the yoke of power; and Guizot says that a government of spiritual power did not exist until the tenth century, when the Church undertook to govern human thought and liberty, private morals and opinions, by the illegitimate use of physical force.

Guizot says: "Up to the present time [forty-five years ago] philosophic and scholastic history has been partial and limited." He says that "justice should be done" to that bold and acute metaphysician, great scholastic philosopher, and much-forgotten pantheist, John Scotus. Our popular historians and "lettered sceptics" ought to teach us something more respecting the scholastics than that their disputes turned upon questions which involve absurdity or incomprehensibility; as, for instance, "How many angels can dance on the point of a needle?" To show that "some liberty of thought in the study of religion" and the interpretation of Scripture prevailed during these ages, and that Catholicism, or rather the Bishop of Rome, had not the power to benumb and paralyze the whole intellect of Christian Europe, nor to compel Christian teachers tamely to accept the dogmas of the Roman Church, Guizot quotes from Scotus' Division of Nature: "I proclaim the things which reason clearly unfolds, without fear of authority or dread of weak minds. The investigation of truth is the most delightful subject." "The salvation of the faithful consists in believing what reason affirms concerning the sole principle of all things, and in comprehending what we have reason to believe." "All things are images of God. All that we perceive and comprehend is but an appearance of what we do not see; a manifestation of what is hidden." "Scripture does not always employ precise and literal words and signs; it uses similitudes, and strained and figurative expressions."

The replies of the barbarian kings to the Roman Catholic Church, in the sixth century, do not indicate that they were "buried in the grossest darkness of pagan superstition." Theodoric said, "We cannot command religion; no one can be forced to believe in spite of himself." Theodobert said, "Since the Deity suffers various religions, we do not prescribe a single one. We remember having read that God must be sacrificed to willingly, and not under the constraint of a master. Those, therefore, who attempt to do otherwise evidently oppose the Divine command."

Yours respectfully,
JOHN CHAPPELLSMITH.

NEWPORT, R.I., 25 Oct., 1874.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—As Frederic R. Honey doubtless intends to answer the question which he puts at the close of his article in your issue of October 22; namely, "Has God in some way or other given us to know what to do for the regulation of our lives?" and as he will probably deal with that question (as he has dealt with the question of the existence of a Deity) with the aid of reason, it is important that every error in logic should be rectified as it is made.

His argument put in syllogistic form may be stated thus:—

Major.—I should not put myself to the trouble of regulating my life unless I were convinced that there is a good God.

Minor.—I do put myself to the trouble of regulating my life.

Conclusion.—Therefore there is a good God.

The error here lies in the conclusion, which should read: "Therefore I am convinced there is a good God." But this leaves the case just as it was found, because the convictions of an individual, valuable as they may be to the owner, carry very little weight to others. Besides, a great many people regulate their lives without being convinced there is a good God, and they would probably refuse to credit the major premise of the syllogism.

Yours truly, SAMUEL R. HONEY.

THE "DESOLATE CHILDREN" AGAIN.

FROM A MISSOURI CORRESPONDENT.

If the thousands whose childhood has been "desolated" by the gloomy teachings of Orthodoxy could tell their experience of their fears of hell and the devil, how they sought to believe in these horrors against the repugnance of outraged conscience and dawning reason, the advocates of these vanishing superstitions would not reproach "infidels" for the desolation of their children's lives. I think the teaching of the Orthodox religions were never so capable of "desolating" the lives of their adherents as at present; for I believe that our sympathies are more tender, our whole spiritual natures more sensitive than ever before, and the effect of any belief that violates these higher feelings is naturally greater than it has been in the past when man lived more in the narrow sphere of selfishness.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

☞ ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, 10c per line.
" 13 " 25	"	8	"	"
" 26 " 51	"	6	"	"
" 52	"	5	"	"

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of ditorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Journal

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 1 Tremont Place, Boston.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
F. W. NEWMAN, England.
CHARLES VOYSEY, England.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

CHARLES SUMNER'S

GREAT WORK.

PROPHETIC VOICES

CONCERNING AMERICA.

By CHARLES SUMNER.

Aside from its literary and historical merits, this volume has a special interest, from the fact that it was the last work on which Mr. Sumner was engaged before his death.

"PROPHETIC VOICES" will be found of great value to all who take an interest in the history of our country, so full is it of passages in which the unexampled prosperity of our land has been foretold by philosophers, poets, statesmen, and orators, of whom the lamented author has also given interesting sketches.

Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

A NEW, SEARCHING, TIMELY BOOK, entitled

By Andrew Jackson Davis.

Treatment of all the delicate and important questions involved in Conjugal Love is straightforward, unmistakably emphatic, and perfectly explicit and plain in every vital particular. Mr. Davis has recently examined the whole field of Marriage, Parentage, Disaffection, and Divorce, and this little volume is the result; which now comes into the world because it is now both wanted and needed by all women and men.

· · · Our friend Andrew Jackson Davis has written a book this time that concerns everybody, and on this side of the great river. It certainly touches their bosoms if not their business, and people who do not care a pin what Mr. Davis thinks of the Summer Land will be interested to see what he knows about conjugal love, and the duties of the marriage relation. His book has a table of contents as attractive as a Delmonico bill of fare.—Golden Age.

Price, in paper covers, 50 cents; in handsome cloth, 75 cents; in full gilt and extra binding, $1. Postage free. The trade supplied on the most liberal terms. Published by the "Progressive Publishing House" of A. J. DAVIS & CO., No. 24 East Fourth Street, New York City

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

We have already issued three editions, the last of which is nearly exhausted.

We desire soon to issue

Another Large Edition

of this and other tracts on the subject, so that we can place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

Last winter this subject was brought before the Legislature of the State, and many petitions were presented asking a repeal of these unjust laws.

The matter is still in their hands, and at the next session will undoubtedly be acted upon. Meanwhile the favoring justice and equity, should be distinctly heard.

Voice of the People,

We shall soon be ready to send out

BLANK PETITIONS AGAIN,

thus giving an opportunity to those who have not already done so, to protest against this continued wrong.

Let us make it

THE LARGEST PETITION

ever presented to our legislative body.

Will those willing to assist in circulating these petitions please

SEND IN THEIR NAMES?

We would say, also that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

If all will unite and work, the results sought can be accomplished

REASONS FOR USING THE

EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

For List of Liberal Leagues, see next page.

GLIMPSES.

INFLATION will not be so popular in the next Congress as in its predecessor.

IS GENERAL MITRE, of the Argentine Republic, a relative of the notorious Tiara?

KULLMANN, the would-be assassin of Prince Bismarck, ought to be rebaptized as Kill-man.

GENERAL BUTLER is elected to stay at home. What is going to become of "Butlerism"? Can the little thing toddle alone?

"CHRISTIAN CITIZENS, vote as you pray!" This was placarded all over the walls in Boston and vicinity before the late election. The question now is—how did they pray?

PROFESSOR J. H. SEELYE, who has just been elected to Congress in this State, is an ardent advocate of the Christian Amendment of the United States Constitution.

IT IS STATED that the grave of Thomas Paine, near New Rochelle, which remained so long undisturbed, has been recently entirely obliterated by Simeon Lester, upon whose farm it was.

THE EVANGELICAL SECTS favor prohibitory legislation with wonderful unanimity; and scarcely a convention is held by any of them without some resolution advocating it. The fact is significant.

STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS will lecture on "Universology, Integralism, and Pantarchism," at Parker Memorial Hall, on the evenings of November 16, 17, 20, 24, 30, and December 1. Admission, thirty-five cents: for the course, one dollar.

A LANDED PROPRIETOR named Korsnicki, according to a Posen paper, sent his carriage to Xions for his surgeon; but, the latter having given a ride to an excommunicated priest named Kubeczak, the owner burned the carriage and dismissed the surgeon. Bigotry is hard to kill.

THE PROHIBITION POLICY has received an emphatic rebuke in Massachusetts. The Republican majority have defeated their own candidate, Governor Talbot, and elected the Democratic ex-Mayor Gaston, of Boston, to succeed him, although the Legislature is largely Republican still. The reason was evidently Governor Talbot's prohibitory vetoes.

THE CABLE announces that a grand international congress is to be held in London to maintain the doctrine of Papal Infallibility, reässert the Pope's right to temporal as well as spiritual power, and declare it the bounden duty of all Christians to return to allegiance to Rome. This congress is convened in obedience to instructions from the Vatican.

A PUBLIC CONVENTION is to be held in Boston, about the middle of December, in favor of the Christian Amendment. The favorers of this movement intend to present a petition to Congress in support of it, in 1876, signed by two millions of names. They reported some 56,000 names, obtained in a few weeks, at their annual convention in Pittsburgh nearly a year ago.

RABBI COHEN, of Syracuse, N. Y., preached for Rev. Mr. Mundy lately in that city. Over this entirely natural occurrence Mr. J. L. Barlow, a "close communion Baptist," wails piteously in the American Wesleyan, calling the occasion "the queerest Sabbath service at which I ever officiated as spectator," and concluding that the public were "all taken in and done for together."

PEOPLE NOWADAYS are apt to resent the suggestion that they cherish superstitions. They profess "total abstinence" in this direction. But some of them remind us of the man who, on remarking that he had eaten forty-nine eggs for breakfast, and on being asked why he had not eaten one more to make up the round fifty, indignantly exclaimed, "What! do you suppose I would make a hog of myself for one egg?"

IT IS SAID in the preface to Modern Christianity a Civilized Heathenism (a book, by the way, that no INDEX reader should leave unread): "Clearly enough, if Christianity is the best means of civilizing mankind, it did not come from God; and, if it came from God through Christ, it is of all the methods most unlikely to promote the civilization of mankind." That is, civilization and Christianity contemplate objects so opposite, the one looking solely to this world and the other to the next, that both cannot be accomplished together.

THIS IS the way in which the Saturday Review classifies reformers: "There are several familiar types of reformers. There is the reformer who promises the most tremendous results from some trumpery little change, perhaps scarcely more than a nominal change, in the existing system. There is the reformer who, for the sake of an infinitesimal and doubtful advantage, is willing to turn everything topsy-turvy; and there is the reformer who, having a good case on one point, discredits and obscures it by mixing it up with all sorts of irrelevant matter, and jumping at large conclusions from a few small facts." If these are the only species of reformer known to the Saturdny Review, it may be forgiven for being so conservative. They all grow on this side the water, together with native species that would scare the "Britishers" out of their wits. What would the Saturday say to a champion of progress who argued that, because there are some thirty thousand millions of property in this country, the volume of currency should be swelled to the same amount, that there might be a paper dollar for every dollar of real wealth? We have heard that opinion gravely advanced; and it reminded us of the Southern rebel who said he used to carry his change to market in a hand-cart and bring his beefsteak home in his porte-monnaie. That picture would be a photograph of the fact, if our reformatory financier had his way. But then there are reformers of a more wholesome sort, of whom the Saturday seems to be in blessed ignorance.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY made an address at the opening of the new Medical School at Owens College, Manchester, of which some very interesting extracts are contained in Nature for October 8. Those who fear (groundlessly, as we think) that science is in danger of totally overshadowing literature will be reässured by this specimen of Huxley's thought: "I trust that the position of the Arts Faculty in this institution will never by a hairbreadth or shadow be diminished, but that a sound and thorough training in literature and general knowledge will be regarded henceforth, as very properly it is now, as the essential foundation in the intellectual life of every educated man; and let me say, to no person is such education and such training of greater importance than to us who are called men of science. Our occupations are very engrossing, and they can be pursued with success only by the intensest stress and attention, and we are obliged even to limit ourselves to particular fractions and particular portions of our own study, if we are to make any advance therein; and unless we have the good fortune to be trained in early youth to take a broad and general view of the interests of human nature, unless our tastes are disciplined and refined, and unless we are led to see that we are citizens and men before anything else, I say it will go very hard indeed with men of science in future generations, and they will run the risk of becoming scientific pedants when they should be men, philosophers, and citizens." Professor Huxley and Professor Tyndall are alike examples of the conspicuous blending of literary with scientific culture, and are doing much to dissipate the crude notion that the two are unfavorable to each other.

Religion at the Bar of Ethics.

BY PROFESSOR FRANCIS W. NEWMAN.

Early religion, as known to us in many nations, was evidently a product of numerous mental influences. It arose before men had definitely and consciously made attempts at science, that is, at systematic and verified knowledge. The idea of duty—or that which is due from each individual to his fellows, to his community, and to its chief—must have been coeval with human existence. Before it arose, man was not yet man, but only a gregarious animal, performing relative duties by instinct; if really out of this were our beginnings. But instruction in duty was long a matter of routine, and its rule was custom; hence our name morals, from the mos majorum, the custom of ancestors. No science of morals was imagined or aimed at. Rights (jura), according to ideas so inveterate as to last almost to the present day, depended on custom; so that a man was believed to have rights over slaves, over wild animals, and wild land, by mere habitual acquiescence. Naturally, then, the duties which man owes to man were thought essentially different from those which man owes, or can owe, to God. His fellow-man needs his help, or his supplies: to withhold them is a harm and an injustice. But God, or the gods, cannot be harmed by us. They want honor, not aid; to withhold it is not an injustice, but a slight, an insult, which they may be expected to resent and punish. Thus the enquiry, "What are the proper ways of honoring Deity?" became quite separate from the other question, "What are the duties of man to man?" nor was it at all to be expected that moral thought should play any large part in shaping the earliest religious doctrine.

Among Hindus and Assyrians, Egyptians and Greeks, speculations of philosophy, necessarily premature, and theories concerning the origin of the universe, formed the basis of religion. Among the more imaginative and flighty nations, poetical fancy exercised an excessive influence on religious thought; among others the responsibility of man to God assumed a higher place, so that the Creator was regarded as a JUDGE, not of great criminals only, but of all men at all times. Here the union was made between religion and morals. Nevertheless, the great mass of the religion remained fantastic, and generally ascribed to the gods the moral weaknesses of men; at the same time, the code of morals was variously defective or erroneous.

As far as known to us in our Western World, both religion and morality continued to be dogmatic—that is, traditional, dictatorial, and unverified—until the era of Socrates, whose whole life was spent in the effort to establish morals on a scientific basis. Religious doctrine, as a whole, he was satisfied to accept by tradition; but his strong good sense insisted on rejecting from the mythology all the tales which attributed immoral conduct to the gods. He was quite aware that many of them were only efforts at philosophy embodied and materialized by poets, which therefore admitted of a spiritual interpretation, freeing them from grossness. But he insisted that such spiritualizing was too tedious and uncertain a business, and, on the whole, a waste of time. We know that silly tales cannot be sacred. Cut them away boldly from religion, and your religion becomes nobler, simpler, stronger. Such appears the cardinal posture of Socrates' mind towards the current theology. He occasionally practised augury from the flight of birds, and had no objection to offer sacrifice, or to consult the oracle of Apollo; because in none of these things did he find immorality. Even so, he appeared to the vulgar to be impiously incredulous. But his incredulity as to morals was far more alarming, because his search was far more fundamental. Wishing to place the knowledge of duty on a safe basis, he dug deeper to find solid ground; and to superficial hearers he seemed to undermine everything and establish nothing. To this, indeed, a personal peculiarity remarkably contributed. When a hearer, embarrassed by his searching questions, asked him what he thought himself, he made a systematic practice of sham humility, professing that he was quite incapable of answering. Nobody was deceived by this. To expect replies from others, and evade their questions in turn, gave him an unfair advantage in the argument; made him very disagreeable as ever trying to exhibit other men as fools, and filled the public with suspicion of him. Aristotle puts down this quality, dissimulation (as, of one's own powers), in the list of vices; in Greek it has the short name irony; he regards Socrates as a preëminent example of this vice. While such a method could not succeed with the public, and indeed brought down upon him at last fierce resentment, when two statesmen, who were supposed to be fair specimens of his pupils, were detested as the bane of Athens; yet with closer students and profounder minds the method was effectual. Thenceforward duty was studied with the painstaking accuracy and continuity of men who desired to make it science. Its Greek name, ethics, slightly differs from morals; for although ēthos and ĕthos probably once both meant the same thing as Latin consuetudo, yet ēthos in Attic did not mean mere custom, but the temperament and tone of the mind. Accordingly, ETHICS takes the inward heart as its main topic, and regards outward action as the manifestation.

Mythology in Greece and Rome long survived the birth of ethics, because ethical culture could not reach far into an illiterate community, and because the charm of poetry preoccupied youthful and ardent minds with religious phantasms. Not the less is it certain that ethics, in proportion as the science was cultivated and diffused, was strongly antagonistic to the Greek religion. The followers of Socrates could not continue in his balanced position; but discerned the utter worthlessness of mere tradition. If they retained the outline of national belief, as aiding patriotism, it was chiefly by rationalizing or spiritualizing it. But from the moment it was understood that ethics rests on a solid basis of human science, and that the national religion has only a cloud basis, resting on we know not what, no one could stand out for any religious doctrine or sentiment which ethics distinctly condemned.

Under the Macedonian and Roman Empires the mixture of populations and increase of travelling brought conflicting mythologies into closer juxtaposition. The ancient pious assumption that all were true, if only rightly interpreted, did not stand long against the manifold proofs of error. With the extension of literature something of general cultivation spread far beyond the circles which can be anyhow termed scientific; and it became inevitable for religion to be brought to the bar of ethics with the whole educated community. Hereby the Hebrew synagogues made proselytes wherever Jews were scattered; since thoughtful Gentiles discerned the superior morality of that creed. Before long the current mythology was attacked on its immoral side alike by accomplished sceptics such as Lucian, and by the earnest vehemence of Christian advocates. Christianity has so uniformly, and in general so successfully, used this weapon against older religions, that no Christian can with decency or plausibility object to its use against his own doctrine, whatever be the form of Christianity to which he may hold. Yet when Garrison, in reply to the assertion that the Bible sanctioned slavery, replied, "If that be true, so much the worse for the Bible," many shuddered at it as profane who had no sympathies with slavery. It is a hard saying, "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured unto you." It is pleasant to have a double balance, one to weigh our neighbor's wares in, and another for one's own; but such devices cannot permanently avail. Men accustomed to argue only with those who hold, with them, some acknowledged standard of truth, as the Thirty-nine Articles, the Catechism, or, more vaguely, the Church, are annoyed when any one appeals from these to the Scriptures. Naturally they were annoyed and pained when Garrison appealed from the Scriptures to intrinsic morality—to human ethics. The appeal made the fact disagreeably prominent, which, in controversy with the heathen, or with any one outside of the Church, appears of itself, that no Scripture can be made the ultimate basis of belief, but there is a higher court before which it must be tried. This, indeed, was from the first virtually asserted, in the words, Unto the poor the Gospel is preached; he that hath ears to hear, let him hear. The poor judge ill concerning alleged physical miracles; they are bad interpreters of ancient prophecies or other ancient writings; they are not cognizant of national history; in short, of all that very miscellaneous literature and knowledge which by modern Christians is called theology, the only part of which the illiterate, or little educated, can be good judges, is the purely ethical part. Moral thought is necessarily the basis of any religion which appeals from the wisdom of the wise to the popular understanding, and glorifies the spirit of God in the heart of babes and sucklings; the same is certain to be the tribunal before which every creed in the future will have to approve itself. Against any new religion, as Mormonism, we instinctively and unhesitatingly appeal to it; and with popular preachers the commonest and cheapest defence of Christianity is to make sweeping assertions concerning the moral defects and vices of "infidels." This, again, is an avowal, made unawares, that religion is fitly judged by ethical free thought.

In presence of the Evangelical Alliance, Professor Theodore Christlier, of Bonn, recently read an elaborate paper in that university on the "Best Methods of Counteracting Infidelity." The method which he recommended was, to expose the miserable results of "infidelity," as attested in history, in contrast to the wholesome effects of Christian faith. It is interesting to see how the challenge is accepted in THE (American) INDEX, a weekly periodical of Boston, which is virtually the organ of the Free Religious Society. "A. W. S.," who was recently editor, says in all kindness he advises Christians not to try this method of defence, for, if they undertake to match man for man, fact for fact, and so compare the moral effects of "infidelity" and Christianity, they will be overwhelmed with discomfiture. "Infidelity" could wish no better vantage given it by Christianity than such a historic comparison would afford. We warn Christians, therefore (says he), not to throw down this glove: it will be taken up with avidity if they do.

Thus both parties warmly avow the high value of the moral test; not precisely saying with Pope, "He can't be wrong whose life is in the right," but, That creed cannot be right whose professors' lives are in the wrong. Nevertheless, both writers seem prepared to employ the test erroneously. On the one hand, under the railing appellation "infidelity" (by which is meant unbelief of the Christian creed), doctrines most various and adverse are confounded. The entire mass of ancient Greek philosophers were Free Religionists, yet they differed by all that separated Zeno from Epicurus, besides the Academicians and others, who debated everything, but decided on nothing. Fully the same vast breadth and depth of chasm exists among those now classed together as "infidels"—nay, Hebrew, Mussulman, and Hindu monotheism make the diversity greater than ever. To attempt to infer a general result from the lives of such an inconguous mass is simply ridiculous. A priori, it is evidently possible that some have risen above the national faith, and others fallen below it. Equally, on the other side, THE INDEX frequently shows itself unjust to Christianity, by imputing to Christian doctrine all the vices, swindlings, and high crimes of Christian professors. Christianity (forsooth) ought to keep its professors moral! Even the baseness of the Tammany ring and official roguery is put down to the discredit of Christianity. Of course an old creed which has gained a high reputation and a solid standing in the world attracts into its ranks those who have worldly objects and no very deep religion. Of necessity they dishonor their religious associates, and the more so the purer and nobler the creed. But a small body dissenting from the national religion is exposed to ill-will or suspicion, and attracts no hypocrites; nay, only men and women earnest for truth. The members of the Free Religious Society have in common, not opinion or belief, but love of truth. It is not closed to avowed atheists; on the other extreme it contains Jewish rabbis. No inference here is possible from comparative morality, any more than in the other case; especially when we add the undoubted fact that the moral conduct of any great mass depends more on national institutions and circumstances than on the creed. It is not in this very vague way that we can get any award from the tribunal of ethics. Some reasonable and intelligible connection must be pointed out between the tenets and the conduct of the votaries; it must be shown that they have acted in accordance with the religion, not against its most authoritative standard. Thus, when in Grecian Corinth a system of harlotry was founded on the religion, we have a right to charge the moral evils on the creed; but when evils arise in Christendom from priestly celibacy and auricular confession, you can only argue from it against a particular church, not against Christianity itself: for we know that these institutions are an aftergrowth, without any authority whatever from the earliest doctrine. As between the Free Religionists and Christendom, we may perhaps already discern two topics, which will furnish, to a certain extent, moral tests—their doctrine concerning women, and their doctrine concerning humility. Each subject may bear a short discussion.

Women in the Greek world were treated as minors, and in Palestine they did not stand much higher. The woman existed for the man, the man for himself or for God. It is undeniable that in the Christian Scriptures the notions of the age were embodied; were accepted by the Apostles, and stereotyped by the Church. A juster appreciation of the status of women, both social and political, has now arisen in many centres. In several respects the Quakers took the lead; yet it cannot be pretended that the movement is properly Christian; it came from free thinking, not from tradition or authority. Free Religionists insist that Christianity, as a traditional creed, has repressed the discussion of women's rights, and has aided the maintenance of imperfect and unjust relations. Nevertheless, on the other side, it is equally true that the Apostolic comparison of marriage to the relation of Christ to the Church, though it has been adverse to the woman's right, has refined and spiritualized the idea of the relation. The anxious question now arises whether under Free Religion an equally pure ideal will be maintained. The men and women who take the lead in that American Society are so pure-minded that to doubt their earnest desire to place the relation of the sexes on the highest and noblest footing would be a causeless insult: yet there is a danger; for masses of men gravitate to the level of principles, whatever the leaders of a new creed may wish to the contrary. Some of them undoubtedly go great lengths in desiring free divorce, and cannot be convinced by the great Roman experiment (so prominently insisted upon by Gibbon) that it will terribly depress, not elevate, morality. Others of them, if they do not deny, yet hold with a very loose hand the belief in a personal God. The outlines of national history known to us suggest that what is called Nature-worship, which differs little from pantheism, strongly conduces to sexual licentiousness; and some students have advanced the definite doctrine that to undermine the belief of a personal, holy God insures a degradation in sexual morals. There is much to countenance this opinion. On the other hand, however high the Christian theory, its influence over Christian nations has hitherto been deplorably feeble. No people of Christendom has any higher boast than that it is not so bad as some others, and might be worse than it is; and those which are somewhat better are better by reason of the political and social institutions, not because of religious doctrine. It therefore remains as an anxious question of the future whether the higher influence and higher cultivation and greater independence of woman—the more refined, tender, and imaginative of the two sexes—will so modify society as to counteract those evil influences which we may fear from a lapse into Greek or Hindu pantheism. At the same time, though students of material science may prevalently take this line, there is as yet no indication that any masses of the community will follow them. A theism akin to that of the Hebrews can alone cement church union.

But next, as to Christian humility. We have grown up under a belief that, in respect to this quality, Christianity added a great and precious beauty to virtue, giving it a noble and sweet tenderness which Pagan goodness could hardly obtain. Even the noblest Stoicism is apt to offend us as harsh and proud; and if later, as in Marcus Aurelius, it was softened, some indirect influence of Christianity may not unreasonably be surmised. Assailants have with excellent reason reproached us modern Europeans for unchristian pride and ferocity. Some of us, in deploring the fact, have attributed it to the ingrained temperament of the Northern peoples. Nations long subject to severe despotism are said to gain softer manners, with less of self-assertion; but no law appears on the surface of the facts. Are Spaniards less proud than Englishmen? In the midst of such ruminations one is quite taken aback by the sudden announcement from the centre of the Free Religionists that Christian humility is not a virtue, but a despicable vice. In a formal, elaborate assault, Mr. Francis Ellingwood Abbot,* editor of THE INDEX, denounces Christianity, "in the name of human virtue," among other reasons for the following:—

"Because it enjoins self-abhorrence as the first condition of the salvation which it offers, makes the denial of all worth or worthiness in mankind the first step in the Christian life, and teaches that Christ will save those alone who have lost all faith in themselves and in their own power to escape the just wrath of God. It thus strikes a deadly blow at the dignity of human nature, extinguishes that noble sentiment of self-respect without which all high virtue is impossible, and smites men with the leprosy of self-contempt. It makes them crawl like reptiles before Christ—'their hands on their mouths, and their mouths in the dust.' It is the very abolition of true manliness among men."

On this passage one may first remark that it identifies Christian doctrine with that of St. Augustine (which never prevailed entirely in Christendom), and is worded more strongly than a majority of Christians will accept; but let us pass this by. Next, the attack is directed as truly against the Hebrew religion as the Christian; indeed, the Hebrews were the earlier offenders, and the Christians have but followed in their track. As to the "self-abhorrence" which a sense of the divine purity brings into the heart of man, the Book of Job takes the lead, and expresses it in coarser terms than any polished persons now choose to employ. Job is not content with the simple statement, "I have heard of thee with the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee: wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes;" but long earlier in the controversy he asks: "How should man be just before God? . . . . If I wash myself in snow-water, and make my hands ever so clean, yet shalt thou plunge me in the ditch, and mine own clothes shall make me to be abhorred." Other writers in THE INDEX have uttered strong contempt against Christianity for the doctrine, that "all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags,"—strangely unaware that the words are a mere quotation from Isaiah lxiv. 6. As a matter of taste one may deprecate the metaphor; but the question remains untouched, whether the sentiment is just.

We have a pretty accurate acquaintance with John Knox, Oliver Cromwell, Sir Harry Vane, and many other Puritans who were high Calvinists, and accepted in their fulness, as did Luther and Calvin, the doctrine so offensive to Mr. Abbot; but it does not at all appear to have lessened their manliness, or made high virtue impossible to them; nay, in contrasting them to their opponents, whether of the Anglican or Tridentine school, who objected to their doctrine as extreme, it would seem that what we now call their "Calvinism" made them more manly. We need not further press this than to say that a part of history in which we have a remarkably full knowledge of men's characters makes Mr. Abbot's assertion very unplausible. If he is right, it must be proved by analysis of the doctrine and its tendency; it will not be proved by history.

Return, then, to the doctrine itself. Is it reasonable that man should justify himself before God? or, on the contrary, that he should be abashed at the sense of his own moral imperfections? The thought may cross one's mind (but probably it is unjust to Mr. Abbot)—Does not the reasoner who insists that we shall not humiliate ourselves before Deity think of God as a being who excels us in power only, and not in moral goodness? As the late Dr. Arnold of Rugby emphatically said, "To worship power only is devil-worship;" of course that is debasing. But as it is wholesome for a child who has wilfully transgressed to be humiliated before a wise and tender parent, so in proportion as is our sense of God's rectitude on the one hand, and our own consciousness on the other hand that we are worse than we might have been, and ought to have been, will be our reasonable abashment. Between equals and fellows dignity may be asserted, but what can be reasonably meant by claiming dignity before God? "To put our hands on our mouths and our mouths in the dust before him," not in dread of punishment, but in moral contrition, appears to be the very mode in which aspiration after the highest virtue is combined with the tenderest sympathy for transgressors outwardly more guilty than ourselves. The foundation of this was laid in Judaism; Christianity has signally built upon it. The parable of Jesus about seeking the sheep that is lost, the doctrine of Paul, "By the grace of God I am what I am," and the reference of all Christian virtue to special divine favor, so that no man can boast, surely tend to all that gentleness and sweetness, forbearance, pity, and candid allowance for other men's faults, which we emphatically praise as Christian. As to "high growth in virtue," what can so conduce to it as a definite conviction that this is that for which God created and ordained us, because it is his own essence? Yet who can vividly feel this without being struck dumb, and as it were cast to the ground, by a sense how impure is his best virtue in contrast to the divine purity?

If Mr. Abbot and others reply, "That may be admitted, provided it be not carried too far; but self-abhorrence is an extravagance;" perhaps we find here a central ground of reconciliation. The fact is that feelings so intense are not and cannot be continuous; or, if they are, the state becomes morbid. The language too of strong feeling, like that of love, is naturally extravagant, and we must not press it to the letter. Most of the schools of Christendom have discerned this, and have declined to follow Augustine in his extreme doctrine; and though the first Protestant Reformers so formulated their creed, their followers soon softened it in interpretation. Hence it is not just in Mr. Abbot to lay this accusation on all Christendom. The worst that can be imputed is that too strong confessions of sin put into the mouths of young people as matter of routine tend to insincerity and unsound sentiment, and that the rare case of a person tormenting himself (as probably did the poet Cowper) by perpetual self-condemnation is unhealthy and dangerous. Such an admission is far short of justifying the very vehement attack, and is quite consistent with maintaining firmly what is expressed in the preceding paragraph.

Besides, the coarser self-condemnation naturally belongs to the earlier stage of Christian life, when strong passions are unsubdued; or to after-crises which involve new moral struggles. Mr. Abbot avows that the "self-abhorrence" is made a "first condition;" which might have been a clew to him. One is inclined to ask, Does he regard himself never to have been a Christian, when he studied and preached as a Unitarian? For we cannot think that he is thus bitterly despising and reviling his own past.

But it is instructive to contrast Christian humility with the virtue of Aristotle's most elaborately drawn character, the magnanimous or great-hearted man. "This is the man, who, being worthy of great things, also counts himself worthy. But that man is little-hearted [or humble?] who thinks too lowly of his own merits; especially if he be in fact highly deserving, so much the worse is his defect. But what the great-hearted man deserves is external good; and peculiarly that which we allot to the gods, namely, honor, which is the greatest of external goods. Of course he must be eminently good to deserve honor, and must be great in each virtue separately; for honor is the prize of virtue, and is assigned to the good only. At great honors, bestowed by worthy men, he will be moderately pleased, as receiving what is his own or somewhat less than his due; still he will accept it, since they give him what they can (!); but honors offered him by common men he will utterly slight, as he will their dishonor of him. Towards wealth and power, prosperity or adversity, he will bear himself evenly, being neither very joyful in success nor very sorrowful in disaster. Counting honor itself a small thing, much more will he so count other outward matters; wherefore such men seem to be contemptuous. Yet successes contribute to magnanimity by increasing grandeur; but without virtue men cannot bear success gracefully. Such do but foolishly imitate the magnanimous man, and while acting unvirtuously look down upon others. But the really magnanimous justly looks down upon others. He has no fondness for endangering himself in petty causes, but when encountering great dangers is scornful of his own life. He is apt to do benefits, but is ashamed of receiving them (!); for to bestow is the part of a superior; but to receive, of an inferior. When he does receive a favor, he repays it in large surplus, trying to make the other party his debtor, and clear himself of obligation (!). He is quick to remember those whom he has benefitted, and apt to forget those who have benefitted him (!); for the receiver is less than the giver, and he wishes to be in the higher place (!). And he hears with pleasure the kindnesses he has performed, and with pain the kindnesses he has received (!). He can hardly bring himself to ask a favor, but he is prompt to confer one. Towards men in high station and prosperity he holds himself lofty, but towards men of middle station he is moderate, and is not overbearing to the lowly. He will not easily enter the lists for honor, or where others are preëminent; and is inactive and dilatory (!), except where the honor or the task is great. In his hatreds and his loves he is open. He cares for truth [or reality] more than for opinion [or appearance]; and he speaks his mind freely, because he is contemptuous. But towards the many, instead of being plain-spoken, he rather speaks ironically [i.e., allusively by half truth]. He is indisposed to wonder [or admire]: for nothing is great to him: nor does he remember injuries, but rather overlooks them. Nor does he talk of men, nor care whether they praise or blame him: nor is he inclined to praise others (!), nor yet to revile even his enemies, except on account of some insult [or outrage]. Least of all will he whimper or entreat. He prefers things handsome and unfruitful to things fruitful and useful: for this is the temperameut of one who is self-sufficient. His movement seems to be slow, and his voice deep (!), and his utterance steady. The character contrary to this is rather the humble; for that extreme is both commoner and worse (!) than to be empty [or presumptuous] and ostentatious, which is the extreme on the other side."

In order to be thoroughly fair, I have risked being tedious in this extract. The more elaborately the acute philosopher develops his ideal of the highest virtue, the more thoroughly unamiable does the picture turn out, because the basis of the character is erroneous. Self, self-esteem, self-honor, self-aggrandizement, ring through the whole; and if this were virtue, virtue would be limited to a select aristocratic few.

How sweet, beautiful, and refreshing is the contrast to all this in the doctrine of not one or two, but every, writer in the New Testament (to say nothing of the Old) concerning human virtue! "In honor prefer one another!" "Charity seeketh not her own." "The wisdom that is from above is pure, peaceable, full of mercy and good fruits." "God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble." "Ye are a holy generation, a royal priesthood, partakers of the divine nature." How can a thoughtful man believe that such doctrine will make us unmanly, smite us with leprosy, and turn us into reptiles? We may here measure a vast improvement on one side of morals attained by Jew and Christian over the excellent and really great Aristotle.

Mr. F. E. Abbot charges on Christian humility that it entails not unmanliness only, but also neglect of justice to other men; but surely the denunciation of humility as a vice led the Greek to unamiable pride, and a devotion to self which must inevitably generate endless strife, quarrel, injustice, and war. It is an interesting speculation, how far the temperament of Alexander the Great may have been built up into that intensity of selfishness and arrogance which had such tragical results, by imbibing this doctrine concerning "magnanimity" from his honored instructor. Even without it, he might have accounted Macedonia and his faithful Macedonians as nothing but tools for building up his own greatness, and passing himself off as a son of Jupiter; but such ethical teaching was all fuel to his natural flame. If the Free Religionists put pride into their religion, instead of humility, they will assuredly make it both unamiable and unjust. If man, having lofty thoughts of God, is not to be lowly before such a Being, it is difficult to expect that he will avoid many unlovely qualities towards his fellow-men.—Frazer's Magazine for June, 1874.

THE BOSTON RADICAL CLUB.

THE INTEREST SURROUNDING ITS EARLY HISTORY—THE TIME OF ITS FORMATION AN AUSPICIOUS ONE—CHARACTER OF THE DISCUSSIONS—LITERARY PYROTECHNICS—A LOFTY CONTEMPT FOR FACTS—BRIGHT TALK VARIED WITH SUBLIME RUBBISH.

The Boston Radical Club is dead. "Not dead but sleepeth," will probably be the modifying judgment of many of its friends, if they read this opening sentence. Nevertheless there are many reasons for believing that this modifying judgment will be begotten of the wish that fathers so many thoughts which would not otherwise be born. It is safe to say that, in the early summer just gone, the Radical Club, which had long been in a decline, quietly breathed its last in its pleasant birthplace and home on Chestnut Street. Probably it is not yet buried. Certainly no funeral rites have been observed. In the present early autumn there may even be some attempts at a literal resurrection, or its body may be embalmed and carried about for a while from house to house. But whatever disposition may be made of the remains, or whatever the cause of its sickness and death, the fact will be found correctly stated—the Radical Club is dead.

"It has done its work," said one of its most prominent members, in conversation, a few weeks ago; "let something else take its place." The judgment thus pronounced implies that the Club has really accomplished a certain work. Assuming this to be true, the character of that work is a fair theme for explanation and candid criticism. When the Club was formed, by some it was ridiculed, by many it was almost feared, by others it was extravagantly lauded; but ridiculed, feared, or praised, it certainly created a sensation. Extended newspaper reports of its meetings and constant references to its doings have testified to the public interest it awakened. That interest is still sufficient to justify a brief review of some points in its history, and a presentation of what the writer regards as its essential characteristics, before "something else takes its place."

Many well remember the widespread and enthusiastic interest excited by the reports of the early meetings of the Radical Club. It was known that many of the brilliant lights of the assumed literary centre of America were present. Emerson, whose sayings had become household words; Alcott, the eccentric philosopher, and his daughter, the rising authoress; Higginson, the essayist, lecturer, and man of society; a score of others, of more or less repute—all were known to attend and to talk. And since the world was, there had been no such talk as that which was listened to by the privileged few who had the open sesame of those sacred parlors.

THE CLUB BEFORE THE REPORTERS' ADVENT.

The Club had been formed, it was said, for the express purpose of allowing our greatest thinkers to compare the results of their deepest thinking. The freest expression was there given to thoughts which the boldest among them would not dare to publish. Lyceum platforms were too narrow, pulpits were too rigid, the press was too timid to endure the untrammelled utterances of these giants. The world was not yet ready for the reception of the perfect truths they had discovered. Unto the elect only, the initiated, the chosen few, could the secrets of the universe be imparted. No themes were too high or too low to form the subject of discussion. With reverent audacity these men and women grappled with and overthrew the established beliefs of the ages. The foundations of the Christian religion, the being of God, old philosophies of the Absolute fairly trembled within the grasp of these modern Boston Samsons. I am writing, remember, of the earliest days of the Club, before the newspaper reporter dispelled somewhat the awfulness of the mystery which surrounded the monthly meetings. While these and kindred rumors were flying through the air, it is easy to understand the intense eagerness with which many people, especially the young, sought to gain admission to those early Monday morning gatherings. The key to the Eleusinian mysteries was not more to be desired than the bit of pasteboard which gave admission through the doors of those antiquated West End mansions. Far away from Boston the interest was almost as great as in the city of its birth. "Are you the one who lives in the house called Beautiful?" said a noted Philadelphia novelist to one of the hosts of the Radical Club, as the latter was once on a visit to the city of the former, some time after the Club had become known by name throughout the country; and the writer then added that one aim of her life was some day to be present at a meeting of the Radical Club, and let her thirsty soul drink a few drops of the nectar which was spilled from the well-filled bowls of the Olympian spirits. Many a young man, doubtless, rang the door-bell for the first time with precisely the same feeling with which the candidate for Masonry raps at the door of the lodge.

THE GENERAL RESULT NIL.

But the young man who enters the Masonic lodge learns, after the first glamour is passed, that the pretended secrets of the ages are only the colored shreds of old discarded learning, patched and sewed together as costumes for worn-out forms which have hobbled by help of the social staff into the gaslight of to-day. Great expectations are forced to be satisfied with extremely little knowledge. It would not be right to say that this Masonic illustration tells the whole truth with regard to the Radical Club; nevertheless it does suggest much which comes nearer the real facts of the case than anything which has yet been told in print. For the Radical Club has undoubtedly proved a sad failure, compared with the expectations which were formed by many at the time of its origin. Most of these expectations may, indeed, have been wholly unreasonable, but even the moderate hopes of others have not been fulfilled. Not only has no great knowledge been revealed, no great impulse been given to thought, but the Club has failed to prove itself an adequate centre for what knowledge and thought were in the country before it began. The numerous essays and extended conversations have ended in nothing of permanent value. A little light on some obscure point in literature, or clearer understanding of some theological dogma, is the most that any one can have gained; and this because of one's previous ignorance, not because of any original announcement in the parlors of the Club.

And yet the time of the formation of the Club was a most auspicious one. This is not the place for giving the proofs of a fact which will be readily admitted, that the present generation is witnessing the accelerated progress, if not the birth, of a new and remarkable intellectual movement. Philosophic writers, some of whom are still living, in England, Germany, and France, have been laboring for years in harmony with a conception of philosophy of which the last generation knew nothing whatever; the marvellous revelations of recent explorers in various fields, and the almost infinite breadth of such scientific generalizations as the Conservation of Energy—all have combined to create or to hasten this movement in the old intellectual centres of the world. Seven years ago, when the Club was born, America was feeling the first impulses of this same movement. Many doubtless supposed that the Club was itself a result of this—or, at least, hoped that it might be, in some sense, its interpreter here in America. It was this hope which accounted for much of the singular enthusiasm to which reference is made above; but this enthusiasm gradually vanished as it became evident that the Club had no such purpose, in fact scarcely recognized the existence of any such movement. The influence of the Club was greatest at its birth,—the influence of expectation. When expectation failed, influence declined, and now is altogether gone.

THE EARLY LIGHTS OF THE CLUB.

No fountain can rise higher than its source. The product of the Club was an expression of its elements. An analysis of its material will tell the wherefore of its failure. To give this analysis it is necessary to mention a few names of the leaders of the Club, names which have become very familiar to regular readers of the reports of its meetings. Dr. Bartol, a very venerable and very clerical looking man, was colleague of and successor to Dr. Lowell in the ministry of the West Church; John T. Sargent, a somewhat superannuated ex-minister, an associate of Theodore Parker, and once a city missionary of Boston; A. Bronson Alcott, over seventy years of age, a man whose peculiar life is well-known to the public; D. A. Wasson, an ex-minister, of middle age, a man of vigorous intellect, one of Mr. Parker's successors; T. W. Higginson, who needs no description; John Weiss, a man of marked characteristics, the most prominent being vividness of imagination, a man whom I have seen described in the gush of reporters as made up of "one-half flame and one-half spirit." With the above should be mentioned Samuel Longfellow, a minister and poet, brother of the more famous poet of the same name; Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, widow of the artist Cheney.

I do not mean to make invidious distinctions, but the above list contains the names of all those who gave the Radicul Club its guiding impulse and its habitual tone. Mr. Emerson fell out about the time that the reporters came in; and though I might easily fill a very large space with names that would be universally recognized—names of men and women who were regular visitors at the Club, or occasionally present, or sometime, or even all the time, regular members,—yet I cannot add another name which seems to me to stand with the above in the same relation to the early life of the Club. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that the Club was run in the interests of those named; not that they at all purposed this, or desired it, or were even themselves conscious of it, but that this became the condition of things.

Glance over the above list, and note the curious fact that the men are, or were, all ministers (with one exception), and even the women are sometimes preachers. A knowledge of this fact explains the deep theological coloring given to all the essays and conversations. Whatever the theme introduced, theology always bore down upon and captured it before it could get away. And the theology, moreover, was pretty much of one kind; that is, it was of "left-wing" (so-called) Unitarian descent. The two favorite Club questions were, first, Shall we, or shall we not, call ourselves Christians? The second was less definite, but was something like this: "What was the exact amount of imperfection in the human nature of Jesus?" When we remember that one or the other of these questions came in almost every time the Club met, and that they were always discussed within the narrow limits of the above-mentioned theology, it will be understood how extremely hair-splitting, how interminably wearisome, and how utterly fruitless were many of those famous Radical discussions. This universal theological twist in one peculiar direction, given to all topics, was one principle reason of the failure of the Radical Club.

REASONS FOR FAILURE.

A second glance over the above list of names gives another reason for this failure. The Club leaders not only held quite similar theological views, but they all belonged to pretty much the same school of philosophy, a compound of the intuitional and transcendental schools. I will not say that they were all disciples of Emerson, but they all belonged to that school of which Emerson is the most shining example. It may answer occasionally for a great man to go to the extreme of intuitionalism, but when lesser men follow the great man, it need not be surprising if the light of their thoughts sometimes seems to come "through a glass, darkly." A good portrait of those above named cannot be better indicated than by quoting one of Mill's paragraphs, in which he says: "It is one of the characteristic prejudices of the reaction of the nineteenth century against the eighteenth, to accord to the unreasoning elements of human nature the infallibility which the eighteenth century is supposed to have ascribed to the reasoning elements. For the apotheosis of reason we have substituted that of instinct; and we call everything instinct which we find in ourselves and for which we cannot trace any rational foundation." What Mr. Mill here calls "instinct," Dr. Bartol would call "the spirit," Colonel Higginson would call "the heart," John Weiss would call "the immanence of the Deity,"—but they all mean the same thing; namely, that which they believe, "and for which they cannot trace any rational foundation."

This is not caricature, though it may be a somewhat rough-shod criticism. From the beginning, the Radical Club seemed rigidly to ignore facts. It was devoted to theories, to pure speculation. If a theory presented was wholly imaginary, without a single fact to substantiate it, so much the better apparently, if it were only set forth with sufficient vividness and brilliancy of word painting. A fact became an intrusion. All present were supposed to be superior to facts. Only low materialists went in search of such common things. If you could not follow a marvellous speculation without looking around for a fact to rest upon, this, of itself, was sufficient evidence of your vulgarity. You had not long enough associated with the gods. If, perchance, a very stubborn fact seemed to block the way, a rhetorical leap usually cleared the obstacle; and this sort of gymnastics was highly regarded. Such questions as, What reasons would you give? or, What facts would you furnish? were very unwelcome questions to some of the most frequent speakers; and the so-called "conversations" often had a tendency to become beautiful dreams rehearsed in a kind of ecstatic monologue. I was present once when an attempt was made by a misguided young man to change the character of the Club. Its subjects, he claimed, were entirely too speculative; let it at least discuss some of the practical social questions of the day. With unusual emphasis, Colonel Higginson immediately replied that he was glad of the opportunity of saying how entirely he disagreed with the previous speaker. "The Club does not desire to be practical. We are all obliged every day to be more practical than we wish to be. The very purpose of the Club is to enable its members to get rid for a time of everything practical, and speculate to our heart's content." The Colonel's remarks were loudly applauded, and there were no further efforts to make the Club practical.

A NARROW LITERARY AND THEOLOGICAL TONE.

It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the whole tone of the Radical Club was narrowly literary and theological. On one occasion some reference was accidentally made to the subject with which the name of Mr. Darwin is so intimately associated. Something had to be said upon his theory, and the stumblings and haltings exhibited by men who can quote the whole of Plato and all the Greek tragedies from memory were really painful. So apparent were their deficiencies that a professor of chemistry, visiting the Club, turned to me and said: "If our literary friends would only look over their science primers occasionally it might save them some mortification, and would make their remarks a little more edifying." At a subsequent meeting one of the younger members, W. C. Gannett, read a very complete and clear exposition of the development hypothesis, though even he gave the usual theological twist, by way of application. When he had finished his paper the usual ready-talkers were either silent or non-committal. Then a visiting clergyman, one whose fame extends over two continents, frankly admitted that he knew nothing about the subject, and wondered that one young head had acquired and was able to contain so much information. Then followed another short period of unusual restraint. The reputation of the Club for rapid and brilliant conversation was certainly in danger, when one of the members asked why it is that Mr. Darwin says nothing at all about a personal God, and what are his probable conceptions of the Deity. Restraint was gone in a moment. Here was a subject about which no one present knew anything whatever. There was not a single embarrassing fact on record. The talkers plumed their pinions and soared serenely aloft at once. The reputation of the Club was saved.

Not every meeting of the Club, of course, ended as absurdly as this; but it is wholly within bounds to say that many of the famous discussions of the Radical Club were of the character indicated in the latter part of the above incident—that is, they were upon subjects susceptible of neither proof nor disproof, the treatment of which, of necessity, was wholly speculative in the most imaginative sense of that word, and the result of the discussion of which always was, and could only be, "words, words, words." Incidentally, of course, these subjects gave opportunity for the display of extended classical reading, of charmingly pictured castles in the air, of brilliant wit, and the perfection of courteous and keen repartee. It was extremely enjoyable sometimes to sit for an hour or two and watch these literary champions show their points in the admiring circle. When Higginson, Weiss, and Wasson were at their best, the frosting, as at the confectioner's, was apt to be much better than the cake. Much of the talk, therefore, was most excellent, of its kind. It was bright, inspiring, hopeful. There was never a mean sentiment or offensive word; but, after all that has been said by admiring friends in its praise, it may have been stimulating, it was not nutritive. It was the wine without the dinner.

"PERFECTION IN NONSENSE."

In Mr. E. B. Tylor's work on Primitive Culture there is a paragraph which might well have been written after a visit to Chestnut Street. Speaking of the doctrine of "brute souls," he says: "The doctrine has fallen from its once high estate. It belonged originally to real though rude science. It has now sunk to become a favorite topic in that mild speculative talk which still does duty so largely as intellectual conversation; and even then its propounders defend it with a lurking consciousness of its being after all a piece of sentimental nonsense." O Radical Club, how much "mild speculative talk" have you made to do duty as "intellectual conversation!" and as for the "sentimental nonsense," may their own consciences forgive them for the amount which your great talkers poured into the open ears of their young admirers. Where did Tylor get his report of that particular meeting of the Radical Club? I mean that particular meeting wherein "one of America's most cultured sons" talked so divinely about "heavenly marriages," or that other particular meeting wherein the "nonsense" was pure and simple without any sentiment at all; when a gray-haired philosopher, talking about the creation, and having all present in a condition of exalted wonder, made several preliminary transcendental statements, and then, looking around the silent, attentive circle, asked, "And animals of prey, lions, tigers, vultures, did God make them? I tell you, no! man made them; the product of his evil nature are they, not of God's." And so awe-struck were all present at this marvellous revelation that not a young man there but would have been ready to swear on the old Dial that he always knew God never made a tiger.

This is sublime rubbish, indeed; and, of course, these instances are extreme and exceptional in the Club's history. Nevertheless, they really happened, and serve to show the perfection in nonsense which may be attained by a rigid adherence to intuitionalism, unchecked by the commonest of common sense. Such puerilities are the last logical outcomes of the school of thought to which many members of the Radical Club belonged.

AN EXPLANATION IN BEHALF OF THE LISTENERS.

To understand how these things could be received in respectful silence, and how things of a slightly better kind could be received with unfeigned admiration, it is necessary to remember, what was mentioned a while ago, the glamour which attended the early meetings, and the halo which surrounded the persons of the speakers. They spoke with the authority of years of literary reputation. They were known to have been connected with the development of that transcendental philosophy of which those who listened had heard, but really knew very little. They had conversed with Margaret Fuller, and written articles for the Dial. If they were not understood, the listener humbly supposed the fault must be his, not theirs. All who visited the Club went there expecting something wonderful, hoping even to be astounded, would have been disappointed if compelled to come away ungratified. Of course, as in the old fable of the bee and the bug in the rose-bud, they found what they sought, and often it was not until long after that they became conscious of the ashes in the centre of the fair-seeming fruit.

Occasionally, however, they did not get far away before the sentimental structures vanished, even in less time than it took to build them up. I remember one morning when the conversation had been unusually stimulating. The best speakers had been present, and all talked in the very best vein. I have utterly forgotten the subject, but the effect of the conversation was ideally charming. For, whatever deficiency the Club may be accused of, there was none ever in its literary pyrotechnics. These were always abundant and beautiful. Give yourself up to their influence, and you would be carried skyward at a rapid rate. Long before the hour for adjournment every one present was off his feet, and exactly where his head was no one could have told. We only knew that we had soared, and soared, and soared so far above our wonted altitudes that we were confused and dizzied by the height attained. We rose to leave the parlors, feeling as though we had undergone spiritual sublimation, and were not yet condensed into our usual earthly forms. We passed down the staircase and into the hall, not knowing yet where we had been, or how we had returned. The front door opened, letting in the clear, cold air, and brilliant sunlight of the winter noon. Along the sidewalk rushed a ragged, happy urchin, and as he ran, with the full strength of his lungs, he shouted out the popular doggerel of the day:—

"Up among the little stars,
Sailing round the moon,
Bless me this is pleasant,
Up in a balloon.
Up in a balloon, boys,
Up in a balloon!"

The portraiture was too exact, and the reaction too great to be endured. One balloon, at least, could stay up no longer, but quickly came to the ground, and not all the flowing words of other meetings could ever fill it quite so full again.

THE CAUSES OF FAILURE SUMMED UP.

The reasons then for the failure of the Radical Club are few and simple. It was narrow in its theological sympathies, narrow in its philosophy; and in its method of thinking was almost the reverse of radical. Such flashes of light as it really emitted came rather from the expiring embers of the old than from the kindling rays of the new. It was an attempt to bring back a kind of culture for which Boston gained some reputation thirty years ago, but which the real intellectual progress of the world has already left far behind. It was, therefore, in many respects, more of a backward movement than a forward one. Its reputation for a time was dazzling, but it dazzled with the splendor of the rocket, and is already burned out. It was exhilarating but unsubstantial. It has left a result like that which attends the inhaling of nitrous-oxide; simple oxygen is not so striking in its effects, but is far healthier for heart and brain.

A LETTER FROM MR. MORSE.

My attention is called to the "onesidedness" of a portion of my report of the Free Religious Association Convention at Providence. I am told that I therein did injustice to one party by making it appear that the only demonstration given by the audience was of sympathy with Mr. Potter in his criticism of Colonel Higginson, ignoring completely the strong applause which often greeted the remarks of Colonel Higginson. It did not occur to me that I was wrongly reporting the matter. The unmentioned applause, which was at times generous, came in, not at the point where Colonel Higginson so emphatically repudiated Dr. Bartol in behalf of the Association, but when he expressed strongly his disapprobation of Dr. Bartol's seeming haste in judging Mr. Beecher, when the latter was so soon to have his character appraised by a legal tribunal. In omitting to mention this, I simply put it aside as I did many things said by Colonel Higginson and others which received applause. Comparatively, it was of little consequence. But the fact that an officer of the Free Religious Association should assume to speak in its behalf, and so speaking to repudiate the opinions of Dr. Bartol, or of any one else, was so shocking to my sense of propriety, considering all the professions of that Association, that I deemed it proper to note that point in particular. And it seemed to me that Colonel Higginson stood there, certainly after Mr. Potter's remarks, in a minority of one. My report, hastily prepared, was undoubtedly faulty, and needed just this statement to explain it.

Though not a member of the Free Religious Association, I was particularly pleased, let me say, that it should in this instance disprove some of my early predictions. Of course there is time enough yet for it to verify all history, and be found at last grown about and fastened in sectarian lines. An organization with officers always suggests danger. It is very apt not to see its own limitations. It starts well. It is, and will remain, the freest of the free. But finally, for some cause or other, affairs get to be cut and dried. Individuals feel the pressure, protest, go outside, try once more, and do the same bad job over again. And so the world goes,—has so gone, at least up to the present seeming exception. And even in this Free Religious Association candor avows a slight suspicion of premeditated respectability; pardonable, one half feels, considering all that transpires in assemblages where spontaneity is provided for. Somewhat is undoubtedly due to intelligence as well as freedom. But, in my judgment, of the two plans, that which includes "rag, tag, and bobtail" is safest and most promising. One or two sessions, at least, might wisely be given up by the Free Religious Association to a general free discussion.

S. H. MORSE.

SPURGEON ON SMOKING.

I demur altogether and most positively to the statement that to smoke tobacco is in itself a sin. It may become so, as any other indifferent action may; but as an action it is no sin. Together with hundreds of thousands of my fellow-Christians, I have smoked, and with them I am under the condemnation of living in habitual sin, if certain accusers are to be believed. As I would not knowingly live even in the smallest violation of the law of God, and sin is the transgression of the law, I will not own to sin when I am not conscious of it. There is growing up in society a Pharisaic system which adds to the commands of God the precepts of men; to that system I will not yield for an hour. The preservation of my liberty may bring upon me the upbraidings of many of the good, and the sneers of the self-righteous; but I shall endure both with serenity, so long as I feel clear in my own conscience before God.

The expression, "smoking to the glory of God," standing alone has an ill sound, and I do not justify it; but in the sense in which I employed it I still stand to it. No Christian should do anything in which he cannot glorify God—and this may be done according to Scripture, in eating and drinking, and the common actions of life. When I have found intense pain relieved, a weary brain soothed, and calm, refreshing sleep obtained by a cigar, I have felt grateful to God, and have blessed his name; this is what I meant, and by no means did I use sacred words triflingly. If through smoking I had wasted an hour of my time—if I had stinted my gifts to the poor—if I had rendered my mind less vigorous—I trust I should see my fault and turn from it; but he who charges me with these things shall have no answer but my forgiveness.

I am told that my open avowal will lessen my influence, and my reply is, that, if I have gained any influence through being different from what I am, I have no wish to retain it. I will do nothing upon the sly, and nothing about which I have a doubt. I am most sorry that prominence has been given to what seems to me so small a matter, and the last thing in my thoughts would have been the mention of it from the pulpit; but I was placed in such a position that I must either by my silence plead guilty to living in sin, or else bring down upon my unfortunate self the fierce rebukes of the anti-tobacco advocates by speaking out honestly. I chose the latter, and although I am now the target of these worthy brethren, I would sooner endure their severest censures than sneakingly do what I could not justify, and earn immunity from their criticism by tamely submitting to be charged with sin in an action which my conscience allows.—London Telegraph.

WITH MR. GREG, I desire a positive religion, and with others I have striven for it; yet, quite independently of this, I insist that the exposure of widespread error is of the greatest value, and is a necessary preliminary to any solid attainment of a better national religion. What more certain than that rubbish and rottenness in the foundation make a building unsafe? What more notorious than that accretions of error choke and neutralize original truth? Therefore I deprecate all apologies for the public assault on that which is discerned as false and mischievous. No one is forced to read; one needs not to be obtrusive on individuals; but in writing we pursue the obvious mode of aiding the general effort for truth. Whatever Mr. W. R. Greg has done against error by his treatise on the Creed of Christendom, or by other books, deserves hearty thanks, whether he has or has not proposed to his readers any new and better foundations. . . . He has tried and proved the New Testament, and has found it wanting, not only as to historical truth, but as to moral and religious wisdom; yet he persists in the effort of hammering out of it what shall be a "guide of life." In fact, he learns by studying the actual world of man; but in his theory, he is to rediscover a fountain of wisdom by penetrating to some "Essence" in a book which he esteems very defective and erroneous. . . . If any one sincerely believes that Jesus was the Hebrew Messiah, well may he honor him, and entitle him "Our Lord," and profess to be a Christian; but the moment that any one has come to a fixed belief that Jesus assumed to be judge of the secrets of all hearts, awarder of their destinies, co-sessor with God, and was not, nothing but confusion and arbitrary favoritism can follow from setting him up as a guide of faith, and declaring that to disinter the essence of his teaching would be a magnificent blessing to mankind.—Prof. F. W. Newman, in Fortnightly Review.

TO LYCEUMS, LIBERAL LEAGUES, ETC.

The undersigned, designing the coming winter to visit several cities in the West, tenders his services to lyceums, liberal leagues, or other progressive associations in that section that may wish to secure them, for one or more lectures.

For a single lecture the subject will be "The Present Condition: or, The Aspects and the Omens of the Time." For a series of lectures, or (if preferred) of conversations, the subjects will be furnished upon application.

Please address without delay,

LITTLE MARGARET:

NOV. 5, 1874.

Dewdrop shining in the grass,
While the mists the morning hide:
When the shadows over-pass,
Little dew-drop summer-dried!

Baby to the glad house born,
Promise of a happy day:
When the sunrise lights its morn,
Little baby stilled for aye!

Dewdrop for the blue sky yearns,
Once again to float above;
Baby from the mother's turns
To the more than mother's Love.

ASTERISK.

SOWING AND REAPING.

Sow with a generous hand,
Pause not for toil or pain;
Weary not through the heat of summer,
Weary not through the cold spring rain;
But wait till the autumn comes
For the sheaves of golden grain.

Scatter the seed, and fear not,
A table will be spread;
What matter if you are too weary
To eat your hard-earned bread!
Sow, while the earth is broken,
For the hungry must be fed.

Sow;—while the seeds are lying
In the warm earth's bosom deep,
And your warm tears fall upon it,
They will stir in their quiet sleep;
And the green blades rise the quicker,
Perchance for the tears you weep.

Then sow,—for the hours are fleeting,
And the seed must fall, to-day;
And care not what hands shall reap it,
Or if you have passed away
Before the waving corn-fields
Shall gladden the summer day.

Sow; and look onward, upward,
Where the starry light appears,—
Where, in spite of the coward's doubting,
Or your own heart's trembling fears,
You shall reap in joy the harvest
You have sown, to-day, in tears.

THE INDEX will be sent to any name not now on our mail-list until January 1, 1876, on receipt of $3.00 in advance. Here is a chance to receive the paper for fourteen months at the price of twelve months. Please tell your friends and neighbors of this liberal offer, and help us to increase our circulation.

A VERY remarkable letter on the Boston Radical Club was recently published in the New York Tribune, and will be found in this week's INDEX. It ought to be submitted to our readers, though many of them will strongly dissent from its estimate of the Club's character and work. There has been considerable laughing over the announcement that the Club is "dead,"—the fact being that it is as lively as ever, and still meets in the hospitable parlors where it first drew the breath of life. Those who are inclined to take an "intuitionalist" view of free religion will not go with the writer in his criticisms; while those who take a "scientific" view of it will not go with him wholly. But the article is altogether too bright and pungent not to be read by every one.

THIS IS the measure of the Independent's conscience: "Mr. Strickland, the ex-Baptist, replies to the accusations made by the Pastors' Conference of Boston, by alleging that he has been till now a Baptist and nothing else, that he has never forfeited his membership in any way, and that the charge of 'fraud' in obtaining and keeping ecclesiastical standing in that denomination is wholly false. We give him the benefit of his denial." But the Independent does not give him the benefit of the documentary proofs of his denial. It suppresses the fact of these proofs, and intimates that Mr. Strickland has done nothing but make an unsubstantiated "allegation." If his documents can be shown to be forged or false, we have not a word to say; but while they remain unchallenged, the Independent is guilty of more sins than we choose to enumerate in representing Mr. Strickland's defence, fortified by such papers, as a mere, naked, unsustained "denial." Commend us not to the mercy of these Christian scalpers of heretics, whose bowels yearn over the heathen across the sea, but who would fain tomahawk the "heathen" at their own doors.

A WISCONSIN correspondent not very long ago wrote as follows: "I have long wondered that some effectual measures were not taken to organize the liberal element of the country. Our village and vicinity are a fair sample of the West in all probability. Having a population of less than three hundred, they have built three churches at a cost of about $17,000, with a yearly outlay of about $3,000 more for the support of ministers, Sunday schools, etc. And yet the liberals are really in a majority here. Instead of organizing themselves, they have (until recently) contributed liberally to the building of the churches of their revilers and for keeping the machinery in motion. While they uniformly favor the creation of libraries, the discussion of scientific questions, and in fact all questions having a tendency to broaden one's views, the churches oppose all these things with might and main. But, thanks to the press, a few of us have been able, by a judicious distribution of tracts and books, to accomplish a great deal: so much, in fact, that for the last two years there have not been more than three or four additions to all the churches, and these were all children. The Methodist society has decreased in this time from 117 to 80 members. The Baptists make a still worse showing, and the Congregationalists about the same percentage of loss as the Methodists." Though not intended for publication, these facts give no little food for reflection.

"RELIGION AT THE BAR OF ETHICS."

The essay by Professor Newman which we copy from Fraser's Magazine as the leading paper for this week suggests more than one subject of fruitful inquiry. It is characterized by his usual learning, ability, dignity, candor, and desire to be just, but also (we are constrained to add) by a certain deficiency of that critical acumen which is necessary to ensure justice in dealing with the thoughts of others. Professor Newman evidently finds it impossible to put himself in the place of one whose opinions he has never held, or whose mental experience has transcended the limits of his own. Having once been an Evangelical Christian, he can analyze the religious consciousness of that order with wonderful subtilty, penetration, and power, as is proved by his books; but, when it comes to criticising the thought of one who has not only passed outside of Christianity but even of theism in its intuitionalist form, he loses his way, is totally at fault, and falls into various pitfalls of unconscious and therefore wholly innocent misrepresentation,—from which he would have been saved either by a greater strength of imagination or by a greater degree of logical insight and continuity. It takes more than learning and conscientiousness to make a just critic: the ability to detect the central point of alien thought and properly to relate all its subordinate positions to this original centre is absolutely essential, though one of the rarest of gifts. It is the lack of this that makes Professor Newman (and so many others) see in Roman Catholicism a mere "corruption" or "perversion" of primitive Christianity; whereas every essential feature of it is exactly as necessary a result of the original gospel as the branches and leaves of a plant are a necessary result of the seed it grew out of. It is the same lack which makes him appear constitutionally incapable of comprehending scientific theism or the religious attitude of those who advocate it. Of the numerous allusions in this essay, for instance, to our own thought, not one is correct. Yet nothing could be more patent than his scrupulous wish and intent to be exactly just. The actual injustice is, of course, directly contrary to his purpose.

Not pausing, however, to correct these misunderstandings, at least in any formal way, we desire to express our hearty acceptance of the general principle on which Professor Newman proceeds, namely, that "religion is fitly judged by Ethical free thought." The ethical tribunal is indeed one from which there is no appeal; if any religion fails to approve itself to the moral judgment of mankind, its doom is sealed. The truth or falsity of its doctrines, it must be conceded, cannot be determined by a merely practical test; it would not do to rely on any analysis of historical or social or moral consequences in pronouncing a verdict on abstract religious formulas, which must be brought to the test of scientific truth alone. But every religion professes to protect the moral interests of mankind, to strengthen the public and private conscience, to elevate the standard of morality, to purify the conduct and practices of its sincere adherents; and if these claims, being subjected to the test of actual human experience, are overthrown, then the religion is convicted of being an arrant pretender and condemned as such.

It is sometimes urged that false tenets necessarily lead to bad morals; that an untrue creed invariably operates to make the life untrue. But this is so doubtful, and in so many instances contradicted by the evidence of facts, that the necessity of the alleged connection may well be called in question; especially when it is borne in mind that practices which are indeed morally erroneous, if judged by the principles of scientific ethics, cannot be pronounced immoral in the sense of deserving moral condemnation, when they embody and express the highest moral convictions of those who find them commanded by their religion. For instance, burning heretics at the stake is a great crime, judged by the laws of scientific ethics; yet it was undeniably a righteous deed, judged by the ethics of Catholic Christianity. Bringing Christianity, then, to the bar of its own ethics would necessitate one verdict, while bringing it to the bar of the ethics of science would necessitate an opposite verdict. It is not enough, therefore, to place "religion at the bar of ethics": both religion and ethics must be placed at the bar of science. Professor Newman may not be prepared to admit this, yet we see no way of avoiding the conclusion. Ultimately, thought must sit in judgment on all things, religion and morals included; and science is neither more nor less than thought conscious of and obedient to the laws of its own being, as established immutably by the nature of things. We hold, therefore, that Professor Newman's own principle binds him, not only to bring religion to the bar of ethics, but also to bring both religion and ethics to the bar of science.

If it be untenable ground to say that false creeds necessitate bad lives, it is even more untenable ground to say that bad lives prove false creeds. It is simply incomprehensible to us how Professor Newman could suppose that we ever entertained any such notion,—that we "impute to Christian doctrine all the vices, swindlings, and high crimes of Christian professors." Bad lives may have many causes. But we should never consider that life bad which is true to its own highest conception of right. If the religion it obeyed proclaimed false ethical principles, obedience to which made the life itself immoral according to the higher ethics of science, then we claim that the religion itself, not its followers, should be arraigned for immorality. By inculcating murder of heretics as a duty to God and man, Catholic Christianity made itself a murderer before the bar of science; and we do right to impute to it all the guilt of the murders thus committed by its superstitious devotees. Why not? But we never said, or believed, that all the murders committed by Catholics are chargeable to Catholicism, which itself forbids most of them. The badness of no life which is contrary to its own creed can be charged to that creed; and for this reason the argument from mere badness of life to falsity of creed is logically worthless. We impeached Christianity in the name of human virtue, not because the general iniquities of Christendom necessarily prove it iniquitous, but because it proclaims doctrines, sanctions motives, and justifies conduct, which continually lead to iniquities condemned instantaneously before the bar of scientific ethics, although to this day defended and approved by the recognized ethics of the whole Christian Church. When Professor Newman vindicates the right of ethics to sit in judgment on religion, every sagacious thinker must applaud him. But the next question is—what ethics? And the only answer which sagacious thinkers can approve must be—the ethics of science. It is a wholesome and happy sign that the jurisdiction of morality over the whole field of religious experience should be so vigorously asserted as it has been by Professor Newman. It will be a happier sign still when the confusion now prevailing among the moral convictions of mankind shall have sufficiently passed away to permit morality to free itself from the entanglements of Christian traditionalism, and mount the throne of pure science, to the end that Nature alone may give law to human life.

A closing word about "humility," to which Professor Newman devotes about half his space. Taking his text from the Impeachment of Christianity, which he totally misconceives by confounding the natural grace of humility with the unnatural "sense of sin" which all Orthodoxy strives to create and foster as an indispensable preliminary of "conversion," he considers that it is great injustice to Christianity and Christians to attribute to them all a doctrine of Augustine which never prevailed entirely in Christendom. The question is not of a special doctrine of Augustine, but of the very essence of Orthodox Christianity. Is it not still preached and held as much as ever by Evangelical believers of all classes that Christ is the sole Savior? That man cannot save himself? That he deserves and must endure the wrath of God unless he throws himself on the mercy of this Savior? Most certainly; and these facts, wholly irrespective of Augustine, justify language much more intense than we used on the subject. Professor Newman refers to various manly Puritans as disproving the idea that such sentiments are the destruction of manliness. It is enough to say that, so far as these men were manly, they were not Orthodox, and, so far as they were Orthodox, they were not manly; unless it is manly to despair of self-help, cringe before power, and grovel in the dust to secure salvation. If the Hebrews did the same, so much the worse for the Hebrews. But we must protest against the misapplication of the passage quoted by Professor Newman to a subject not raised by it. The title of humility, especially the humility of the private soul in presence of its ideal of absolute purity, to be considered a virtue was not at all questioned in what we said; and our critic's comments, however true they may be in themselves, have no relevancy to their text. The "self-abhorrence" which is demanded by the doctrine of total depravity, and professed verbally at every service on every Sunday in nearly every church of Christendom, has nothing whatever to do with the self-respecting humility of the natural man, who is deeply conscious of his own imperfections, but would rather be "damned" than escape "damnation" at the price of sycophancy even before Infinite Power.

"What can be reasonably meant by claiming dignity before God?" asks Professor Newman. Probably no claim of this sort is ever entered; but the man who is unconscious of possessing dignity, whether before God or his fellows, has lived to little purpose. The relics of Professor Newman's Evangelical education here make themselves very visible. The prayer of Epictetus, surely not deficient in such humility "as may become a man," is the soliloquy of one who has never forgotten the duty of preserving his self-respect, and who no more forgets that respect is justly due to him from whatever Intelligence takes cognizance of his life. The extravagance of Christian "self-abhorrence," which denies all reality to natural virtue, still tinges the religious consciousness of Professor Newman as expressed in this paper; it is not humility, but humiliation—a very different thing. The soul which will permit no insincerity with itself knows the falsehood of the pretence that all its acts, thoughts, motives, impulses, and so forth, are evil; it knows that many of these are good; and why should it not expect God to pay proper deference to the fact? Is he to be excused from recognizing that there is good as well as evil in men's hearts and lives? Or are men bound to feign forgetfulness of their own goodness when they raise their thoughts to Infinite Purity? If it be pagan to contemn such hypocrisy, pagan we are, and pagan let us stay! The "self-abhorrence" inseparable from every Evangelical "experience of religion" is far enough removed from the grave, measured regret of a true man at the retrospect of failures and faults; the one is humanity careening over and sinking in a sea of self-contempt,—the other is humanity tossed by the waves, but still holding stoutly on its course. There is no use in striving to keep the world attuned to the key of the penitential psalms. The humility which gives the lie to facts, magnifies sins into undue proportions, crowds out the joyous or proud remembrance of noble deeds as derogatory to God's supremacy in holiness,—such humility is a curse, and cannot too soon be outgrown. Give us the truth of things, and the spirit which reveres it: then the graces of sentiment and the subtler virtues of feeling will take care of themselves.

WHO IS THE CRIMINAL?

In a majority of cases where crime is committed, society is more blamable than the individual. External conditions and circumstances are mostly the cause of crime; not any inherent evil disposition in men and women. These conditions and circumstances the individual generally is not responsible for; they are the product of social arrangements, usages, and demands. As the world goes, the individual does not make society so much as society makes the individual,—the life that he lives being often, not that which he would live, but that which he must live. Every man is born to his lot; not the lot which he chooses, but the lot which is his fate. And not infrequently he spends his whole life in an unsuccessful effort to change the lot which was thrust upon him when he entered the world. Society stands by and sees him struggle; and it does not know—or, it does not care, if it knows,—that it is quite as much for its interests as for his, that the man should get the better of his circumstances, and make his condition more favorable to his virtuous and happy living.

When I hear that a crime has been committed against the welfare and peace of society, I find that I am not swift to condemn the individual offender, as though he or she were the only or chief party to blame in the matter; but rather disposed to inquire how far society itself has induced the crime, by suggesting, tempting, and provoking it with its own unjust laws, arbitrary dictations, unnatural restraints, selfish indifference, and cruel neglect. And in most cases I find that my indignation has been reserved, not for the so-called criminal, but for his or her self-constituted judge and condemner, and real tempter and provoker to evil—society itself.

A case has recently occurred in this city, which illustrates my point. Within a few days, one of the heaviest banking institutions of Boston has discovered that its assistant receiving-teller is a defaulter to the net amount of seven or eight thousand dollars. This fact standing alone, and stated without any extenuating circumstances, would naturally invoke upon the head of the dishonest bank-officer the condemnation of all virtuous people. But there are extenuating circumstances connected with this affair (as, indeed, there are with most such affairs); and, when known, they go far to at least divide the blame for the offence between the robber and the robbed.

This assistant receiving-teller is a man about thirty years of age. He has been in the employ of this one bank some ten years, and during this time has been an increasingly trusted and efficient servant of the institution,—handling on an average a million of dollars a day. His neighbors and friends, so far as I can learn, testify unanimously to his general good character and reputation. He has been an industrious, sober, economical, modest, quiet, thoroughgoing man. Within two years, or thereabout, he has married, and now has a wife and child, with whom he has lived pleasantly, cosily, and frugally. This man altogether was one not likely to take money which did not belong to him. It must have been an extraordinary temptation which could induce him to do it. Did he have such a temptation; and, if so, who was the tempter?

It is not an unimportant thing to know, in this connection, how much salary this man had. Remember, he was assistant receiving-teller in one of the heaviest, if not the very heaviest, banking institutions in Boston; he was made responsible daily for the safe transfer from hand to hand of a million of dollars more or less; he had served his employers with signal efficiency for ten years; he had with their knowledge, in the meantime, married and undertaken the support of a family; the bank, during all this while, was flourishing in business and in fortune, and reaping the accruing benefits of a large prosperity. Did they pay this servant of theirs well; did they give him a chance to improve his own condition with theirs; did they allow him to share fairly in the increasing profits which he helped to earn; did they make him feel that they had any lively interest in his welfare, or cared in the least whether he and his little family lived comfortably and respectably, or not? I do not learn that they did anything of the kind. At any rate, this is the fact; that they paid this employé, on whose shoulders they piled such labors and such responsibilities, the paltry sum of eight hundred dollars a year!

Now, I say that the Directors of this bank deliberately tempted this man to steal from them. Nay, more; I say that they were the original thieves, and that for years they robbed this employé of wages that fairly belonged to him. Can we be very much surprised that he retaliated at last, and robbed them in return? He took their money, not to speculate with, not to gamble with, not to spend in reckless and foolish extravagance; but to meet his ordinary household expenses,—to pay his butcher, his baker, and his grocer. I confess that my indignation waxes hot when I think of the injustice, the selfishness, the parsimony, the meanness with which this great, overgrown, moneyed corporation treated this poor, laborious, well-deserving young man. I am sorry, for his own sake and his family's, that he descended to the level of his employers, and became a thief like them; but I find it exceedingly hard to manufacture any grief in my breast that they have lost some of their ill-gotten gains.

And the same crime which this bank has committed against this young man in its employ is committed in numberless instances by other corporations against their employés. Horse-Railroad Companies hire conductors for miserably small wages, and then hire "spotters" to watch them lest they steal a few of the fares! In the first place, they tempt the conductors to steal by paying them so unfairly; and in the second place they insult them by setting fellow-employés to watch them. If these conductors were paid good, just salaries by the Companies that can well afford to do it, the stealing, while it might not be done away wholly, would be reduced ninety per cent.

It is the old story of the crime of capital against labor, of society against the individual. Until the sinners cease to be sinned against, they will continue to sin. It is the duty of society to remove as much temptation as possible from before the individual, and not to keep the standing insult of suspicion staring him in the face, provoking him to offences. And then, when the individual does sin, society should proceed with him in such a way as to restore him to his own and its respect and confidence as speedily as possible, and not to plunge him deeper into disgrace and degradation. "All sin is hunger," a thoughtful person has said to me. Often, indeed, it is nothing more nor less than this,—sometimes hunger of the body, sometimes of the mind, sometimes of the heart. Let us learn how to feed people,—to give them not merely what they want but what they really need of body-food, mind-food, and heart-food,—and we shall have done much towards banishing sin from the world, and keeping men from becoming sinners.

THE COMING BROAD CHURCH.

In a recent article on the International Congress of Orientalists in London, I spoke of the new views of religion, and of the broader religious acquaintance and fellowship that must be one of the inevitable consequences of the labors of that body. Another sign in the same direction, though of slighter shape, has since been shown in this country.

It seems that there is a movement among us for establishing a University of Modern Languages, at which not only all the languages of modern Europe but the Oriental languages shall be thoroughly taught, and as far as possible by teachers to whom they are native. In furtherance of this project an important meeting was held a fortnight ago in Newburyport, Mass., where it is proposed to locate the University. Various gentlemen interested in the movement addressed the meeting; but, judging by the newspaper reports, about the brightest and most interesting speech that was made was by Hon. Chan Lai Sun, a member of the Chinese Imperial Commission on Education, who is in this country for the purpose of keeping some supervision over the Chinese youth who are coming hither to be educated. So far as this speech gives evidence, he appears to be a believer in the religion of his own country still; for, in explaining how China and America could help each other, and why the Chinese young men were sent here for their education, he told the audience plainly that "China did not want the religion of America"—"of course not," he added, as if that were a preposterous thought,—but that it did want America's "arts and sciences," and that it was only for this that her young men were coming here. Several Evangelical clergymen took part in the meeting, yet not one of them, nor any layman, rebuked this heathen speech, nor seemed to be at all offended by the presence of the speaker. Not a word is reported as having been uttered that was not equally courteous to Buddhist and Confucian as to Christian believers. One or two speakers mildly suggested that one advantage of the University would be the opportunity it would offer for educating young missionaries in the Oriental languages before they should go to their posts; but this was an argument that Confucian missionaries—and there are such—might have used in the interest of propagating their own faith among English-speaking races; and no one followed up the suggestion by enlarging upon the need and duty of Christian propagandism, or argued for the University on this ground. Apparently, the Hon. Chan Lai Sun, scrupulously introduced by his title, and seemingly regarded as good as any body upon the platform, gave the key-note of the meeting in the declaration that the services between the Oriental and Occidental nations were to be reciprocal, and not religious propagandism on the one side or the other. And in accordance with this idea, the argument pervading all the speeches was the utility of the proposed University for bringing the two sides of the globe into closer acquaintance and fellowship.

And as one of the results of such better mutual acquaintance, it is impossible that there should not be a modification of religious faith and practice on both sides. The Boston landlady of the Confucian lecturer, Wong Chin Fou, now in this country, said to me the other day, "He has been here at our house since July, and we are all delighted with him." They were American people, brought up in the Christian faith doubtless, yet it does not seem to have occurred to them that their pagan guest was a subject for "conversion." Perhaps they had heard of the case reported, for which, however, I cannot vouch, of the bright foreman of the Chinese shoemakers at North Adams, whom the Methodists boasted to have converted to Christianity, but who was soon afterwards, it is alleged, detected in some "financial irregularities." Occasionally one of the young Japanese or Chinese that come here to be educated changes his faith to the Christian religion. The marvel is that, coming at the most impressible age, and thrown in among all kinds of Christian influences, the greater part are not converted. The most of them, however, continue to hold their old faith, though without doubt it becomes modified. But, at the same time, the views of the Christians with whom they come into contact concerning their heathen faith gets modified too, and as a consequence their own Christian faith gets broadened, and sheds some of its peculiar theological features. These Oriental young men are seen to be generous, gentle, reverent, aspiring, honest, affectionate, true, and quite as simple and pure in habit as young men of our Christian civilization; and it comes to be felt that the religious faith which is associated with such character cannot be wholly false or corrupting.

Thus in Christendom as elsewhere the signs are multiplying that people are awaking out of their narrow provincial theologies, and are opening their eyes to a wider and more cosmopolitan view of religious truth and fellowship. They are beginning to get a glimpse of the magnificent proportions of a church that shall be as broad as humanity. Towards the religion of the future every one of the great religions of the world has some valuable contribution to make, which, not mechanically, but by organic growth, is to be wrought into the substance of the world's thought and life. The Orient, where all the great religions have had their birth, and the Occident, where religion has been most modified in its career by modern civilization, are to be reunited for the religious completeness of both. Feeling and thought, spiritual imagination and practical understanding, inspiration of the heart and vigorous will, both and all are needed for the production of the highest form of religion, whether in individual experience or in a race.

The Western nations have certainly much yet to learn from the Eastern. If they need us we also need them. The religion of Christendom would have more of breadth and graciousness and charity, would be less angular, less provincial, would have a sweeter tone and a more sympathetic spirit, if to the virtues that have been specially developed in the modern Western world were to be added some of the old but not yet exhausted virtues of the Oriental races. We have more particularly the virtues of enterprise, whether material or mental, the virtues that delight in conquering obstacles and subduing the earth to man's service, the virtues of advancing civilization, and of healthy intellectual and moral movement. But they have more of what we may call the home virtues,—trust, contentedness, patience, stability, hospitality, magnanimity, unselfish simplicity, generous faith in each other. How it would benefit our impatient, restless temperaments, soothe down our feverish haste and ambitions, healthily balance our wasting nervous eagerness and instinctive discontent, if we could have an infusion into our natures of somewhat of their sobriety, serenity, temperance, patient persistency, childlikeness, repose; a repose which with them, for the want of elements of character to be drawn from the West, may have come too near to philosophic fatalism and to practical stagnation, but which at heart is a deep confidence in the laws of the universe and in the Infinite Power that pervades those laws! BIGOTRY IN POLITICS.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

For many ages bigotry in belief, as to matters outside of the present life, has been the motive power of government. In Europe this bigotry has christened itself the Church, which has always, more or less openly and absolutely, controlled the State. The object of the bigots has been to produce uniformity of faith; the actual result to produce almost universal hypocrisy.

The Church came across the mighty water to America, with no lack of bigotry, but under the banners of dissent. Divided against itself, it happily lost the power of controlling the secular government. But unhappily it has not lost the whole of its bigotry. This bigotry, in despair of ruling America in the name of the Church, now begins to rebaptize itself as Religion, and avows its purpose to control politics, not so much in the interest of uniformity of faith as of good morals. But the necessary result must still, as ever before, be hypocrisy. Virtue comes not by compulsion or reward, but by pure reason appealing to the sense of right and wrong. So far as the Church is a collection of persons sincerely believing in given dogmas, nobody can object to its propagating its faith by purely intellectual arguments; but the moment it oversteps this line, and attempts to make converts by physical rewards and punishments, or to promote good morals by compulsion, it begins to establish our right to regard it as a conclave having bigotry for its motive power, and hypocrisy for its certain result.

For one, I cannot believe that bigotry is the motive power of the Church, or rather churches, of America, or that any one of them, as such, has an ambition to control the State. My chief reason for this incredulity is the fact that the bigotry is organizing itself outside of the churches, in such bodies as the Christian Amendment Society and the Young Men's Christian Association. Through the churches, as such, comes to the people weekly a great deal of the wisdom of the ages, along with the superstition and poor theology of the so-called sound writers. Bad as is the mixture, it is immensely better than nothing, especially for those who like it. And as long as they are not possessed with the insane will that everybody shall like and swallow it all, whether or no, one may well believe, in this age, that the truth is working more powerfully in them than the falsehood and the vain imaginations.

But the Amendment people and the "praying-bands" do obviously contemplate establishing what they call religion by law, through the use of political machinery—a movement which the American churches have a common interest, stronger than what the "world" has, to nip in the bud.

Thirty years ago it was my lot to ramble a little in the by-ways of England, where they have an Established Church; and I could not resist the conviction that its coercive power was a cause of demoralization nearly equal to that of chattel-slavery in our own country. It seemed to repress thought and create hypocrisy everywhere. It seemed to put the rebellious souls whom its tyranny had repelled into dissent into an opposite state of electricity nearly as bad as its own. The way it often brought its power to bear on secular affairs was to an American even ludicrous. In this country it would be called the essence of meanness. I am reminded of this by overhauling a package of old letters accumulated in my English ramble, among which I find this, which I begged as a curiosity from the man who received it. He was a farmer of Hooknorton, Chipping Norton, who had applied for the lease of a small farm belonging to a Mr. Field, of Deddington, a Christian of the Established Church. I give it as a fair sample of hundreds of similar facts which forced themselves upon my attention, fit to breed contempt. I say nothing of a multitude of other facts fit to arouse indignation.

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

DEDDINGTON, 4th Jan., 1844.

Sir,—I further considered the subject on which I particularly enquired your sentiments on Monday, and am still more convinced that I should not be doing my duty to my neighbors, if I were to let the farm to a dissenter from the Established Church. As I do not wish to put any restraint on your feelings or conduct in this respect, I think it would be better if you gave up all thought of taking the farm; and if I do not see you on Saturday, I shall conclude that you have done so. Were it not for this objection, I should have been glad to let it you, as I believe you to be a good farmer, and that you would have made us a good tenant.

I am, sir, yours faithfully,

SAMUEL FIELD.

JAR-BREAKERS.

It may be said that, in regard to matters connected with the advancement of science and theology, there are three classes of mind in the community. The first class (and it is but a small one) is composed of those who jar the world; the second, of those whose business it is to ease or break the jar for the third and largest class, who cannot bear jarring, and must never upon any account be jarred!

These classes have naturally their organs and representatives in certain newspapers. Readers of THE INDEX need not be reminded of an organ of the first class; nor is it necessary to indicate any belonging to the third class. Their name is Legion.

Of the jar-breaking organs the number is not large, but from the middle ground they occupy their influence is widely felt. Three or four of the ablest hail from New York. I know of no more serviceable jar-breaker than the Independent. Apparently unable or unwilling to trace the logical sequence of its premises, coquetting one week with the principles of Free Religion, and the next loftily disowning their only legitimate outcome—it yet, by its systematic discouragement of sheer dogmatism and creed-slavery, is doing most excellent service in the cause it professes to oppose. I believe I speak advisedly in saying that, as an agency in bridging the gulf between advanced Orthodoxy and cautious Radicalism, it has no rival in Christendom.

Especially upon the dogma of eternal punishment its utterances have vastly assisted the opening of free discussion. After the adjournment of the Evangelical Alliance, the Independent took occasion to rebuke the exclusiveness which closed its doors to Universalists, reminding the clergy that large numbers in other communions no longer hold that doctrine to be an essential of their creed.

Yet the careful editor by no means compromised himself. "We have tried to believe in the final salvation of all men," he writes in an article denying that hell is the basis of the kingdom of heaven, "but cannot feel justified in doing so." He continues—in substance, I do not quote the exact words: "We cannot help believing that a long-continued course of wilful and defiant sinning may so harden the conscience of a man as to make it, by a simply natural law, forever unsusceptible of repentance." This would be very good, if it were only the out-breaking sinners whom Christianity condemns to eternal death. But it must not be ignored that the condemnation includes also men of moral life who simply fail to "close with the terms of salvation" through the blood of Jesus. Does the diplomatic jar-breaker give us his opinion of this side of the question? Not at all. Rigidly Orthodox readers would find in the paragraph quoted pleasant confirmation of their cherished doctrine; but the wide-awake, inquiring soul on the watch for new truth, noting the omission, would decide for itself: "Ah, this editor no more believes that people are sent to perdition for simple disbelief of the doctrines than Mr. Abbot does!"

Instances of like skilful, not to say strategic, handling of the Orthodox creeds are not unfrequent in the columns of the Independent. They should be labelled, "Cushions for the Delicate; making the transit easy from the religion of authority to a Free Religion!" Indeed, so many within the circle of my own acquaintance have been led by these seductive editorials to question, to investigate, and finally to bid farewell to their old dogmatic beliefs, that it has for some time been my practice to lead inquiring minds, by a graduated series of its articles, up to the radical edge of the Independent, and then so dexterously to slide them over to the conservative (?) corner of THE INDEX that they are scarcely aware of any shock to their nerves!

Therefore, O INDEX, deal gently with the jar-breakers. The work they do would perhaps be and verily they have their reward.

"Poorer done by better hands,"

PARKER MEMORIAL HALL---WAS IT DESECRATED?

BY W. F. JAMIESON.

"Ye cut muckle whangs out o' ither folk's cheese."
"Ye hae the wrang soo by the lug."—Scotch Proverbs.

Two communications have appeared in THE INDEX concerning the Mass Convention (called by some a free-love meeting), one by Bishop Ferrette, the other by John Wetherbee. Really, I can see no reason why these gentlemen, with their avowed liberal, radical views, should write in so censorious a vein. One says he is no coward, no chicken, and afraid of no gale, but—but—this September free-love typhoon was too much for him. He asks: "If the Hall Committee at all foresaw what was to take place, on what grounds could they have permitted their hall to be used in this manner?" He then adds—if on the ground of "liberty of speech," he has no objection, only drop Parker's name from the hall! A stranger to Parker would suppose from such a statement that the latter was not much of a friend to free speech. In mournful accents the Bishop asks: "Would Theodore Parker, if yet alive, be seen in his own hall while thus occupied?" In Humanity's name, why not? Bishop Ferrette was there. Other great and good men were there. John Wetherbee was there.

The Bishop seemed to forget how liberal he was in the commencement of his letter. He says: "I admit that there should be a place where these things [terrible social heresies] may be freely said; and, as I have no superstitious notions of places, let them be said in a church, if need be." Then why find fault with Parker Memorial Hall Committee? They practised the liberality which the Bishop preaches; or is Parker Hall more sacred than a church?

He takes up most of his article in discussing the social problem, the very thing that most of the speakers at the Convention discussed. So, that there might be no mistake in his meaning, he says: "I will talk of things plainly." And so he does. He talks of "promiscuous sexual intercourse," "syphilis," "begetting children," "self-abuse." The evils of our great social system, its manifold corruptions, he heartily deplores, which places him side by side with the free lovers whom he affects to despise.

If the Bishop had read his article in the "Free Lovers'" Convention, or any other assemblage of ladies and gentlemen, every listening prude would have been disgusted with his plain talk.

Why should liberals write as if Freedom were unsafe? Where liberty of speech exists, there will be much in matter and manner of many speakers that will be false and displeasing. Liberty is not for the cultured alone. The vulgar and unlettered are equally entitled to its precious privileges.

As for Mr. Wetherbee, we are fully aware that he expresses himself in the most elegant manner. Classical is our friend. Before he reaches a dozen lines he calls the Convention a "cattle-show" by implication. He informed one person "that this Convention was a ship sailing under false colors." Was it? He says "they had no right to call it a Spiritualists' Convention." Did he read the call?

This Convention is expressly for the purpose of discussion and propaganda; and all Spiritualists, Socialists, Infidels, Materialists, Free Religionists, and Free Thinkers are cordially invited to attend and join in the effort to advance the cause of truth and human welfare. All subjects in which the good of the race is involved will be legitimate themes for discussion and for set speeches.

Any fault to find with that? Such a call is an honor to any body of people.

Friend Wetherbee complains that "the subject of Spiritualism was entirely left out." There was but little of what is called Summer Land speech-making; but there was some, enough to prove that Mr. Wetherbee is not exact in his statement, "entirely left out." Each speaker was perfectly free to choose his or her own theme. If what is called Spiritualism received but little attention, it was doubtless owing to the conviction, which has become prevalent among Spiritualists, that for a quarter of a century we have had a surfeit of lectures upon the "beautiful hills" of the rolling spheres. There is every-day work to be done down in this world. Mr. Wetherbee says he is "aware the community groans under its hypocrisy, that the evils that the 'spouters' [one of his classical expressions] of this Convention complain of are not much, if any, overstated." This is another admission of the great work accomplished by this much-abused Convention. But he is so ashamed to have Spiritualism mixed up with "outside issues"! And yet he says through Spiritualism logically "these crying and admitted evils will be cured." How cured, if Spiritualism is too dainty to deal with them?

Mr. Wetherbee admits that the speakers at the Convention "have a perfect right to discuss the subjects they did, and in the way they did." Then why call them "freedom-shriekers"? If that term "shrieker" is voted elegant, why not apply it to all platform and pulpit eloquence?

He says the "better portion" of the Spiritualists do not wish to be "disturbers of the peace;" unless humanity is to gain something by the disturbance. Who can tell the issue before the revolution? If Abolitionists had waited to see the "gain" in their agitation, no word for the slave would have been spoken. Indeed the Abolitionists were constantly reminded that their freedom-shrieking would provoke the anger of the South; engender hatred between the blacks and whites; arouse the worst passions of human nature; render the condition of the slaves more abject; and finally plunge the whole country into war. Notwithstanding that ghastly picture, the "shrieking" proceeded.

Mr. Wetherbee says: "I follow where truth leads, and take the consequences." Then why should he concern himself with "gain"? Gain or lose, sink or swim, Truth, and its open vindication, is what reformers profess to seek. Then away with all mere time-serving expedients.

Mr. Wetherbee tells us no one will accuse him of "being anything but a radical." That makes his letter all the more astonishing. There are many who testify that they have heard him "shriek" for social freedom. Perhaps he was "influenced" to write his letter.

SINGING AS AN ATTRACTION.

MR. EDITOR:—

There is one point to which perhaps not sufficient attention has been paid by Liberals and Free Religionists.

It is observable everywhere that those who do not accept Orthodoxy in all its hideousness still attend church or service at some Orthodox church, and most likely their children attend the Sunday-school. They take a pew there, and thus contribute to the continuation of error that they may think more or less effectually exploded. This is for two reasons, perhaps.

1. It is proper. Other people who wear good clothes, who pass for respectable members of society, and who are desirable associates, attend this church. Therefore it is the thing to do.

Their children also attend the Sunday-school. The strivings for place and preferment, the tickets and premiums, all show the efforts to attract and interest them. But for the latter, the crowning attraction, in this city at least, is anniversary day: a day when the children assemble in their gayest attire at their Sunday-school rooms, and march in order to the general rendezvous, each class of each school having a banner carried by some preferred member, and on each banner an inscription which designates the class. At the rendezvous of some half dozen or more schools, the children listen to speeches by Mr. Prosy, or Mr. Bore, or Mr. Dry-talk, as the case may be (sometimes with a show of impatience on the part of the boys), and intersperse these "addresses" with songs, hearty and enjoyable, in which they all join. Then they march (i.e., the Orthodox white children do: the children of Unitarian, Universalist, Catholic, and negro schools being excluded by the police), and present a gay appearance, attracting large crowds along the line of march, and making glad the hearts of the fond mothers at least. After marching they separate, and repair to their respective churches, to enjoy ice-cream, lemonade, candies, oranges, and such other things as appeal to and cultivate their veneration through the gustatory nerve.

2. In many churches the main reason is the attraction given to the services by the singing. Only the pleasant side of their picture is presented in their songs. By these lively songs nervous stimulation and excitement are produced, to a degree comparable with that produced by moderate potations of the bibulous. The higher grade, the trance and unconscious state attainable at protracted and camp meetings, commonly expressed by the term "getting the power," is more properly comparable in viciousness to inebriation, and is not so destructive, only because not so easily, therefore not so frequently, attained. We repeat, it is not the mental but the emotional that is appealed to. On this point allow me to quote from an article in the June number of the Association Advocate, the organ of the Brooklyn Young Men's Christian Association. Speaking of open air meetings at the Atlantic Docks, it says: "Many youths and a few cleanly-clad mothers with their little ones (probably from the houses near) came also, and listened with evident delight. These meetings are to be kept up throughout the season. They will be varied by short, pithy addresses, and those tender heart-melodies which never fail in their touching expression to reach the point of need and sensibility in the human soul. The first requisites are real, earnest singers and speakers, who know the chords of the human heart, and how to adapt themselves to the understanding and conditions of plain, unlettered people. We beg all who can sing, male or female, to be with us. Singing is a great and indispensable power. Could we raise such a musical sound as would ring out in harmony over all that basin and surrounding dwellings, thousands would flock to hear and receive the blessed influences."

Such tunes as our Methodist friends sing, "Come, thou Fount of every blessing!" "How happy are they who their Savior obey!" "Year of Jubilee," "Nearer, my God, to thee!" "Jesus died for me," etc., are enlivening tunes which stir the sensibilities, exalt the emotions, and prepare the mind for such teaching as would be wholly revolting in their calmer moments.

Now what Liberals and Free Religionists can do is so to shape their religious services as to use these taking tunes, and sing words to them conveying lessons of love towards and charity for all mankind, kindness to all God's creatures, fair dealing, honesty, integrity, self-respect; lessons which some of our "Christian statesmen" seem never to have learned, or to have utterly forgotten.

Let some one in our ranks, who has the gift of rhyme, so embody these teachings for the benefit of the race, the advancement of the cause, the ennobling of humanity, that they can be sung to the tunes with which all Christendom is familiar, and thus supplant Calvinistic cruelties of sin, atonement, eternal punishment, and the like, with the nobler teachings of the Free Religionists. Then, when these more exalted ideas have been instilled into the minds of the "rising" generation, and when the "rising" shall have become the "present" generation, may we look for less corruption in high places!

Of course these remarks have no application to the elegant musical services for the delectation of the intellectual audiences whose privilege it is to be ministered unto by the analytical Frothingham, of New York, or the scholarly Chadwick, of Brooklyn.

Yours, TIPTON.

LIBERAL WORKERS IN WISCONSIN.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

It was our privilege to be present at Whitewater, at the liberal convention held there on October 12, 13, 14, and 15, where we witnessed a good assembly of liberal thinkers from different parts of the State and from the West.

A joint committee of Universalists and Unitarians in June last had made the arrangements and programme for this convention. One of its objects was to enlist all liberal workers and thinkers in the work of reform. The essay of Rev. W. H. Harrington, of Belvidere, Ill. (subject: "What's in a name?"), was full of rich thought. He is too liberal for the old line Universalists. He is a young man.

Rev. W. S. Balch, of Elgin, Ill., Universalist, gave a lecture on the evening of the 13th. Subject: "Science and Religion—Is there a God above Matter?" Dr. Balch's lecture was to some extent a review of Prof. Tyndall's famous address, and, to the surprise of many of the more moderate Universalists and Unitarians, an endorsement of the professor. Pent-up creeds are too small for the speaker, evidently.

On the last day of the Convention, Rev. Dr. Kerr, of Rochford, Ill., preached before the Convention a most radical and able liberal sermon. Subject: "Ideas in Religions—Survival of the Fittest."

We give these few features of this Convention showing the liberal thinkers and workers here. The several speakers were followed on most of these subjects with criticisms.

Most of the young men, both in the Universalist and Unitarian denominations, are too liberal for the conservative of those denominations; but we were pleased, notwithstanding, to witness that kindness and courtesy which are always possessed so fully by men of culture so largely manifest. J. L. Jones, of Janesville, Wis., G. W. Cooke, of Sharon, Wis., and W. H. Harrington, are preaching to good congregations. B. F. HOLMES.

SECRET ORGANIZATION AGAIN.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Oct. 20, 1874.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Since becoming a reader of THE INDEX, articles headed "Organization" have been frequently published in your paper. One feature of the articles seemed always prominent, which was that, while they left the impression of a quite general desire for organization on the part of "Liberals," no plan for organization was suggested, or had been thought out.

In a communication, dated August 10, to Mr. Abbot (intended to have been private), I asked if some acceptable plan could not be devised, and hinted at one which might be secret, at least so far as signs or passwords were concerned. It was no part of my idea that the opinions or purposes of the organization should be hid, or in any way disguised; such organization I should oppose. On the contrary, while those opinions and purposes might be well known, the individual member could avow his connection at such times and places as he alone chose. Such plan, or something similar to it, it appeared to me, would leave every person free to express his opinions individually as freely as he does now when outside of all organizations, while he would feel that he was not standing quite alone, but was one of many workers, all connected by the tie of union. To the weak it would give some strength, and make the brave stronger.

Some may object that my plan does not include an effective organization; that the liberal elements, after entering such union, would be as non effective and scattered as at present. Perhaps so. But let the objectors consider that I am of the class referred to at the commencement of this article—without a plan,—and, like them, anxious to hear from some one who has a plan. Yours for truth,

E. C. ALPHONSE.

[We are sorry to have mistaken the intent of Mr. Alphonse as to the publication of his former communication, for we scrupulously respect the wishes of our correspondents in this respect, when known. Let us suggest that they mark them all either "For THE INDEX" or "Private," as the case may be; and then we shall not fall into the same blunder again.

No "plan" of organization could be devised which would meet all requirements: everything depends on the purpose to be served. Social clubs, debating clubs, lecture unions, literary societies, Liberal Leagues, and so forth, all require different plans. Organization for its own sake is useless; there must be something to organize for. A general union of Liberals must be for general objects, and, if they have no such objects, no union is possible or desirable. We wish all Liberals appreciated the importance of the objects specified on our first page. But until they do, we counsel no abortive attempts. When the freedom-loving part of this nation perceive what is still necessary to secure entire religious freedom, they will doubtless unite. Meanwhile we labor to show this necessity, waiting patiently for a response.—ED.]

THE QUINTESSENCE OF SIN.

Half a century ago, or thereabouts, I remember hearing an Evangelical minister giving before a large congregation the following definition of a Unitarian: "A Unitarian is something between a Jew and the devil. He denies the God that bought him. He boasts of his good works; but his good works will hang like millstones round his neck, to draw him deeper into the gulf of destruction."

I remember hearing another minister (he was a Presbyterian) defining Roman Catholicism thus: "It is a system engendered in hell, and vomited forth by Satan upon earth, to become the bane and curse of mankind."

Both these theologians and highly popular preachers occupied pulpits at Liverpool (England); and now we have a not less popular preacher, and not less influential theologian, Spurgeon, addressing his hearers as follows: "Oh, sirs! believe me, could you roll all sins into one,—could you take murder, and blasphemy, and lust, adultery, and fornication, and everything that is vile, and unite them all into one vast globe of black corruption, they would not equal even then the sin of unbelief. This is the monarch sin; the quintessence of guilt; the mixture of the venom of all crime; the dregs of the wine of Gomorrah; it is the A 1 sin; the masterpiece of Satan; the chief work of the devil." Ecce Evangelicalism!

Not long since in this city a clergyman (Catholic) told the criminal under the gallows: "Oh! I wish that I could go where you are going to-day!" Ecce Catholicism!

With such preachings, such teachings, whether Evangelical or Catholic; with the assurance that it requires but a leap from the scaffold to land one in heaven; with the belief that sin has long since been expiated; that the penalty has been paid in advance eighteen hundred years ago; that a firm belief therein is a carte blanche for the commission of crime, and the indulgence in vice is a passport to eternal happiness,—it would not be surprising were virtue, honor, rectitude, and humanity eradicated, and man ere long reduced to a condition below that of the beast of the field, if not to that of the forest.

If there were a devil, such teachings would be that devil's; God's they cannot be. D. E. L.

CHILDREN AND CREEDS.

Every one who has studied the nature of childhood to any extent must have been impressed with the fearless freedom with which children seek a knowledge of the mysteries of life and all of the wonderful forms of Nature around them. They have no instinctive idea of "forbidden fruit," and approach every tree accessible to their childish thought or fancy with the same guileless freedom. Vaguely conscious of a kinship with Nature, they regard her with an affectionate familiarity. As reflection dawns on the young inhabitant of this world of wonders, he is often deeply perplexed in trying to comprehend the reality of what he sees. The facts of Nature suggest an undiscovered cause which is his first metaphysical problem; but of this he has no instinctive fear. What he cannot comprehend he invests with no imaginary terrors, and feels no condemnation in endeavoring to explore the mysteries of life and God.

This period of artless truth-seeking is the most beautiful portion of human existence. Would that it could be made to extend through all the years of man's life! But what a melancholy change does superstition produce! How it steals from childhood its simple trust, and casts over its sunny mind the shadows of unnatural fears! The monsters of popular religious teachings are marshalled before the young innocent, and a horrid nightmare of dread paralyzes his soul. The beautiful simplicity that characterized his thoughts and feelings is now perverted into unnatural misgivings. Nature no longer greets his approaches with encouragement, but frowns on his attempts to penetrate her secrets. The vast unknown beyond this life is filled with horrors from which his nature recoils. Thus the tender heart of childhood, warm and buoyant with natural love and faith, is smitten by the terrors of superstition, and forced into the prison of a false creed. A life deformed in intellect and starved in affections is the consequence.

That this is not an exaggeration of the effects of teaching the Orthodox religious doctrines to children, I think many now struggling to free themselves from the impressions thus received in childhood can testify. These impressions cannot always be entirely eradicated by the reason of maturer years; and some minds which seem to be illuminated by the clearest light of rational thought are sometimes darkened by the shadows of those gloomy ideas of religion received in childhood from well-meaning but ignorant piety. When will enlightened benevolence guard the helpless children of our race from those horrid ghosts which still haunt the abode of civilized man, and lead their trembling victims to the altar of a false religion?

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
HENRY S. STEBBINS.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, NO. 1 TREMONT PL., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of ditorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

CONCERNING AMERICA.

By CHARLES SUMNER.

Aside from its literary and historical merits, this volume has a special interest, from the fact that it was the last work on which Mr. Sumner was engaged before his death.

"PROPHETIC VOICES" will be found of great value to all who take an interest in the history of our country, so full is it of passages in which the unexampled prosperity of our land has been foretold by philosophers, poets, statesmen, and orators, of whom the lamented author has also given interesting sketches.

Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

A NEW, SEARCHING, TIMELY BOOK, entitled

By Andrew Jackson Davis.

Treatment of all the delicate and important questions involved in Conjugal Love is straightforward, unmistakably emphatic, and perfectly explicit and plain in every vital particular. Mr. Davis has recently examined the whole field of Marriage, Parentage, Disaffection, and Divorce, and this little volume is the result; which now comes into the world because it is now both wanted and needed by all women and men.

· · · Our friend Andrew Jackson Davis has written a book this time that concerns everybody, and on this side of the great river. It certainly touches their bosoms if not their business, and people who do not care a pin what Mr. Davis thinks of the Summer-Land will be interested to see what he knows about conjugal love, and the duties of the marriage relation. His book has a table of contents as attractive as a Delmonico bill of fare.—Golden Age.

Price, in paper covers, 50 cents; in handsome cloth, 75 cents; in full gilt and extra binding, $1. Postage free. The trade supplied on the most liberal terms. Published by the "Progressive Publishing House" of A. J. DAVIS & CO., No. 24 East Fourth Street, New York City

THOMAS' SACRED QUARTETS.

A work just issued, but which has been many years in preparation, and of which the author may well be proud.

The collection cannot fail to take the front rank in church music, and be used wherever the best music is appreciated.

The music is admirable for Quartet Choirs. Without being on the whole very difficult, it is in perfect taste, and for larger choirs, for musical families, and musical societies, the book has a special adaptation.

BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Our organization some time since decided to direct its efforts for the present towards securing the whereby church and other corporate property is unjustly exempted from its share of the burden of taxation.

As a means to this end, we have published for general circulation several thousand copies of a

TRACT

on Church Exemption, being the article by Mr. Abbot which appeared in THE INDEX of Nov. 27.

We have already issued three editions, the last of which is nearly exhausted.

We desire soon to issue

Another Large Edition

of this and other tracts on the subject, so that we can place a copy in the hands of

EVERY VOTER IN THE STATE,

and generously to supply the calls for them in other States.

To do this, we need funds; for, although we have made arrangements for printing the Tract at very low cost, it is impossible for the Boston League, with its various other expenses, to bear the entire expense alone.

Will not, then,

All Friends of the Movement

come forward and help us with liberal donations?

We frequently receive communications from parties wishing tracts to distribute, asking how much they shall pay. To such we reply that the cost to us is about $2.50 per thousand, and we shall be pleased to furnish them at this price per thousand, or 30 cents per hundred, to all who will circulate them. But all additional donations will be gratefully received for the purpose of circulating them gratuitously throughout the country.

Last winter this subject was brought before the Legislature of the State, and many petitions were presented asking a repeal of these unjust laws.

The matter is still in their hands, and at the next session will undoubtedly be acted upon. Meanwhile the favoring justice and equity, should be distinctly heard.

Voice of the People,

We shall soon be ready to send out

thus giving an opportunity to those who have not already done so, to protest against this continued wrong.

Let us make it

ever presented to our legislative body.

Will those willing to assist in circulating these petitions please

SEND IN THEIR NAMES?

We would say, also that we feel deeply the need of

Other Organizations

in this State, to coöperate with us in securing equality and justice, by pressing the "Demands of Liberalism." If, in any locality, there are those who are inclined to we are ready to render such assistance as lies in our power.

Form a Liberal League,

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

RITUALISM is the expression of dogma. Hence its sole importance.

THE RUSSIAN government has resolved to introduce the system of compulsory education. The Berlin system was to go into operation at St. Petersburg on November 15.

REV. E. F. STRICKLAND, who has been so slanderously attacked by the Baptist clergy of Boston and the New York Independent, informs us that his society in East Stoughton have become alarmed at the situation, and given him notice that his services will not be required after December. Meanwhile he is at liberty to preach elsewhere, and desires to do so. His address is 16 Medford Street, Chelsea, Mass.

A VIRULENT ATTACK on Colonel Charles D. Miller, a Republican candidate for the New York Assembly and a subscriber to THE INDEX, was made just before the election by the Geneva Gazette, on the ground of his alleged "atheism." The article is too much of a curiosity not to be reproduced in these columns, and will be found elsewhere. Colonel Miller's character stands too high to be affected by such a miserable exhibition of bigotry, and even the Gazette is forced to pay an involuntary tribute to his courage and sincerity.

A CLERK tried to drive a baulky horse up Broadway. Whipping was tried to an extent that ought to have called out Mr. Bergh with his whole Society; but all to no purpose. A jockey strolled by, saw the situation, seized a handful of snow, and rubbed it vigorously all over the animal's nose. At once the horse moved obediently on. As he started, the jockey remarked to the astonished youth, "Whippin' ain't allers the thing: what he wanted was a new idee." A handful of snow has been rubbed all over the nose of the Administration by the late election. It is now confidently expected that the beast, having got a "new idee," will move on; and, it is hoped, in the direction of positive reform.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL is needed as much in New Haven as in New Orleans, it seems. According to the Boston Sunday Herald of October 18, "The Hampton singers recently attended the Third Congregational Church in New Haven. On entering the church, two of them being of quite a light complexion and a little ahead of the others, the usher, not looking very closely, took them for white men and was about to give them seats in the centre of the church, near the front; but on seeing some of the darker ones follow, discovered his mistake and exclaimed, 'Oh! I didn't notice! You will have to go back!' And they had to take back seats." Will such cruel nonsense never cease? It is a striking confirmation of the truth of Mr. Pillsbury's representations as to the relation of the churches to the rights of colored men.

NATHAN BURGESS thus confessed the murder of Joseph Robbins, bridge watchman on the Vandalia Railroad, in open court at Terre Haute, Indiana, on November 9: "I knew the Vandalia pay-car had passed that afternoon and had paid Robbins his month's wages. I got that shot-gun and went to the bridge. As I approached the watch-house I saw, through the window, Robbins sitting inside. His shoulders and head only could be seen. I raised the gun and fired. I then hesitated a few minutes to listen if the report of the gun had aroused any one. I then went up to the watch-house door and found Robbins on his knees praying. I plainly heard him say: 'O God, have mercy on the one who did this. Spare him, for Jesus' sake.' I was horrified, and turned and ran I did not know where. I did not enter the house, nor touch the door. His words haunt me still." Let us pay a tribute of unfeigned reverence to such Christianity as transfigured the dying hour of this poor murdered man. The superstition of it is all lost in the glory of his great forgiveness, which was every whit as noble as that of his deified Master, and sprang from a fountain older than he, the human soul.

IN THE November issue of the Camp News, published in Philadelphia as the organ of the "Patriotic Order Sons of America," and now in its eighth volume, we find the following questions by a correspondent and answers by the editor:—

"W. H. H.—First: Can a man whose character is good in every respect, who believes in a Supreme Being, but who does not accept the Bible as the divinely inspired 'Word of God,' become a member of the P. O. S. of A.?

"If this refers to the Bible generally, we answer, No.

"Second: Can a man who acknowledges a Supreme Being, as do the Deist and Theist, but who denies a personal God, become a member of the P. O. S. of A.?

"Answer: No."

Another editorial declaration in the same issue is to the effect that the Order is opposed to the removal of the Bible from the public schools, and in general to the "complete secularization of our government and the free school system;" and that belief in a Supreme Being is a qualification of membership, as above stated. It is now sufficiently obvious that the Order can command little sympathy, despite its professed devotion to "every true principle of American liberty," from those who understand what liberty requires. The Order is evidently a Know-Nothing organization for the defence of Protestant Christianity, and is one of the forces opposed to the political demands of Free Religion.

THE TIME for preparing a new Unitarian Year Book is at hand. It will contain, as usual, a list of recognized Unitarian ministers, and also a list of recognized Unitarian societies. In order to prepare an "honest" list of the ministers, which is a most commendable object, it was found absolutely necessary last year to interrogate all clergymen of doubtful orthodoxy, and inquire whether their names stood with their consent in a catalogue of "Unitarian Christian" divines. In consequence of this questioning, Messrs. Potter and Stevens were "dropped," as the phrase ran. Now we suppose that the authorities are just as anxious to have an "honest" list of the societies of the denomination as of the ministers. They will undoubtedly, therefore, interrogate this year all the societies of doubtful orthodoxy, whether the retention of their names in a list of "Unitarian Christian" societies is with their free consent. Consistency evidently requires this course. The New Bedford society will, of course, be the first one interrogated; for, notwithstanding the fact that their non-Christian minister was "dropped," they still retain him, and even went so far as to raise his salary immediately after his excommunication, in order to show how much they loved and esteemed him. What graver cause for interrogation could possibly exist? We respectfully suggest, therefore, to this refractory New Bedford congregation, which have shown such an independent spirit in obeying their own convictions of duty rather than the requirements of Orthodox Unitarianism, to be preparing their answer to the forthcoming interrogatory, that the prompt appearance of the Year Book may not be retarded by any delay on their part. The liberal public will await their action with great interest. THE INDEX stands all ready to applaud the conscientiousness of the denominational authorities in risking the displeasure of one of their wealthiest and most influential societies in order to secure an "honest" list. In this attitude we count upon the sympathy of the Christian Register, which will doubtless copy this paragraph for conscience' sake.

Opening Address

AT THE CONVENTION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION AT HOWARD HALL, PROVIDENCE, RHODE ISLAND, OCTOBER 29, 1874.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

The Free Religious Association presents itself for the first time to the citizens of Providence, and thanks them for the large welcome which it receives. Our conventions are unlike most religious conventions. We have no great array of lordly names, no long roll of churches, no certificates of membership, no formularies in regard to the ritualism to be discussed. We simply present ourselves as a body of men who have an idea which we believe deeply concerns the American people. That we are worthy representatives of the idea we have never claimed. We are simply representatives of the idea which the time has called up. We shall be very happy, on our part, when younger men will come forward and take our places, and give to our idea a larger interpretation than it has ever received from us.

It has been our misfortune to be always, notwithstanding our utmost candor, misunderstood. Some charge us with hostility to Christianity, when we are in truth the foes of no religious system as such. Others accuse us of putting all religions on the same ground, because we do our best to be just to all. Yet others profess to think that we meditate an amalgamation of religions and the formation of a new one by a process of eclecticism, than which nothing could be further from our thought. In the last edition of Appleton's Cyclopædia, the aim of our association is declared to be the substitution of the rationalistic for the Christian belief. It would be impossible to get further from the truth. We contemplate nothing of the kind. We should not even if we had a system of rationalistic belief to suggest in place of that which prevails. But we have no such system; we have no system whatever. It does not enter into our purpose to make any system.

Our idea, so far from being a novelty, is one of the oldest in the world. It is expressed thus in an old Lufi book: "If thou art a Mussulman, go stay with the Franks; if a Christian, join the Jews; if a Shrah, mix with the schismatics. Whatever thy religion, associate with men of opposite persuasion. If in hearing their discourses thou art not in the least moved, but canst mingle with them freely, thou hast attained peace and art master of creation."

And again: "Each prophet who appears is not to be opposed to his predecessors, nor yet complacently to exalt his law."

And again, from an ancient Buddhist writing: "The rays of intelligence make the order of venerable teachers. They are all and equally born to unite science and virtue."

It is from the profound study of these oldest of Scriptures that the eloquent and distinguished Max Müller came to the conclusion which he announced at the recent meeting of Orientalists in London: "That all religions spring from the same sacred soil, the human heart; that all are quickened by the same divine spirit, the still, small voice; and that, though the outward forms of religion may change, may wither and decay, yet, as long as man is what he is and what he has been, he will postulate again and again the Infinite and the very condition of the Finite." "We have learned already one lesson, that behind the helpless expressions which language has devised, whether in the East or in the West, for uttering the unutterable, there is the same intention, the same striving, the same stammering, the same faith."

There, fitly and persuasively expressed, is our idea, extracted from sources that were living before our Christianity was heard of.

Let me repeat: With religious creeds, as such, we have no quarrel, whether they be Romanist or Protestant, Orthodox or Heterodox. We are not theologians, we carry no theological weapons, we wage no theological war. Indeed, it is one of our persuasions, one of mine perhaps it would be more proper to say, that the theological war is nearly ended. The religious world is losing its interest in polemics.

If we could ascertain the proportion of theological books and of books of science and history published within the last two or three years in Germany or England or the United States, I think we should discover that there was a marked falling off in the number of theological books, showing that the drift of the active mind of man is away from the old theological questions. That this is so in Germany there can scarcely be a question. In England, the religious literature is still in excess of any other. But it has changed its character entirely. It is no longer the old polemic literature that flourished a century ago. It consists of sentimental books, books of piety, worship, ritualism, books about ecclesiastical forms and usages.

The Church of England is full of gentlemen, highly educated and exceedingly well provided for, who have little else to do than study pastoral theology, as it is called; and the English press groans with the books and pamphlets that these gentlemen publish. But they are of no value. They make no mark on the thought of the time. The active mind studies science, history, the creation of the world, astronomy, the facts of the universe.

If we deal with theology at all, it is that we may do away entirely with the theological method, and substitute the scientific method in its place. You understand the difference between the two methods. Science studies facts; theology studies creeds. Science says the newest truth is the truest; theology says the oldest truth is the truest. Science looks forward; theology looks backward. Science looks with open eyes at the creation as it is; theology speculates with closed eyes on the creation as it has been supposed to be. The method of science may lead to Trinity, to Atonement; who knows? Stick to the method is all we insist upon. The method of theology may, by-and-by, lead to Materialism; who knows? The method is wrong whatever it leads to.

But we are not engaged in any theological war. The question that presses sorely upon us is that religion will not confine itself to speculation, but insists upon striving for personal power. The churches are struggling for power; not for truth, not for humanity, not for philanthropy, but for individual power; each religion standing upon its own platform, gathering about it its own methods, and using every means—not always amiable, not always just—to further its own ends and establish its own dominion.

Sir James Mackintosh predicted that church power would certainly not survive the nineteenth century. A quarter of the century yet remains, and no one can tell what the next twenty-five years may bring forth. But certainly the signs at present point the other way. In Rome, the head of the Italian Church, with commendable frankness and an appreciation of his position that is worthy of praise, denounces the spirit of the age, bids defiance to the powers of the secular world—science, philosophy, material enterprise,—claims the whole domain of mind and society as his own, and bids the church pray for the overthrow of Bismarck, "the colossus." The Old Catholics, seeing only weakness and impotency in the claims of the Roman Pontiff, and fearing the downfall of the Catholic Church if his rash spirit is encouraged, attempt a new coalition in which all good Catholics, East and West, may combine; and meditate a restoration of ancient creeds, confessions, and rites with new guarantees and larger sympathies. Döllinger and Hyacinthe are as hostile to radicalism as is the Pope himself, but they would fight radicalism with new weapons. To build up the true Catholic Church on primitive and everlasting foundations is their avowed purpose. The "Evangelical Alliance" is a league, offensive and defensive, of the Evangelical churches, all over the civilized world, against Romanism on the one hand and what is called Infidelity on the other—a league to secure and perpetuate power.

Is not the English Church striving for power in England—striving against the Catholic Church on the one side and against Rationalism on the other? What means the debate that has been going on for the last week in New York about Ritualism? What do they care about Ritualism except as Ritualism means Romanism? The struggle there is which—Protestant Episcopacy or Catholicism—shall have the revenues, the estate, the prestige, the social influence that the Episcopal Church holds to-day. It is the Episcopal Church in America against the Catholic Church in America—the Episcopal Church being divided against itself. How the battle goes on in London and all over England is known to all readers of the papers.

There never was a time when all the churches, from highest to lowest—from the Greek Church on the one side to the Roman Church on the other, from the Protestant Episcopal Church to the Unitarian and Universalist Churches,—were so bent upon maintaining their own individual preëminence, and sustaining their own power. This is the fact that staggers us when we look at the religious problem of the present time. Indifferent as I personally am to any man's religious opinion, perfectly willing that he should believe what he must or will—the depravity of man, the eternal doom of the wicked, the damnation of unbaptized infants, three deities, or three thousand, if that belief commends itself to his best reason,—the one thing I cannot tolerate, without a protest, is, that any man, or church, or nation should say to the next-door neighbor, "I believe this, therefore you shall believe the same." The claim of infallibility is the claim we resent.

This is a practical question that goes to the root of some of the most substantial interests of our age—this question of the disarmament of religions. That is what we demand.

Do you wish any evidence that this struggle for power, simply as power, is the main feature in the religious aspect of the present time? See how the different religions contend together on the missionary field. Read the reports of the Bible societies, the tract associations. See how every church does its utmost to make it appear that its missions are the most successful, that its societies have the largest funds to work with, that its men are always in the front rank of those who do the best work. Does not that show that the different churches are striving, not to regenerate the world, but to build themselves up in authority and prestige? The converts are counted, not weighed. Numbers are the evidence of strength.

In this country the question comes home with great seriousness. If there is any interest that the American people should hold dear, that interest is education. In a republic the people must be educated, as a means to the intelligent exercise of their liberty. Not that education will regenerate men; not that a measure of reading, writing, arithmetic will make men virtuous. More than schooling is required for that. Education provides nothing but available intelligence; but it does provide that, and therefore it is indispensable. Now, what is opposed to this system of education? It is the battle of the churches. The people are gradually learning, by political experience, by the contest of parties, by the amalgamation of many races and nations, that a uniform system of education is positively required. From all parts of the country comes a passionate cry for an education that shall be systematic and universal. Now, what do we have to prevent it? The battle between Protestantism and Romanism will prevent it if it can. The Roman Church will prevent it if it can. The Protestant churches will prevent it if they can. What means this quarrel between the Roman and the Protestant churches on the question of the Bible in the public schools? Do the Roman priests suppose that simply by having a figure of the Virgin put over the door, or the marking of the forehead with a cross, or the reading of the Douay Testament, they are going to make the boys and girls good men and women? It is ridiculous to suppose it for a moment. Do the Protestants think that the simple reading of the Bible, either a whole chapter or a few verses, every morning, is going to have a moral effect upon the boys and girls? It is ridiculous. Children get religion at home, if they get it anywhere. They get it from example. They get it from the Sunday-school, perhaps—not so certainly. Such religion as children get they get from their fathers and mothers. They do not get it from the public school. The object of the public school, as every Romanist and every Protestant knows, is to teach boys and girls to use their understandings. But the Protestant Church says: "We would teach boys and girls to use their understandings in the Protestant way;" the Romanist says: "We would teach boys and girls to use their understandings in the Roman Catholic way." The Romanist insists upon the Bible being excluded from the schools because he insists upon his own power; and if the Bible is not excluded from the schools he hopes to get money to build up his Roman Catholic churches. The Protestant insists upon the reading of the Bible in the schools because the Bible is the Protestant shibboleth, and as long as it is kept in the schools the Protestant has a nominal hold, at least, upon the education of the children. While this great debate is going on, the children are untaught, the schools are torn to pieces, inquisition is made into the religious belief of teachers and not into their capacity, and the system of education is endangered from the very foundation. Therefore it is, we say, that it deeply concerns the American people to see to it that this struggle for power between the churches is not carried on upon the field of education. The American people cannot afford to put in jeopardy the institution on which their political existence actually depends. They cannot spare their school-rooms for ecclesiastical battle-grounds.

Again, what is the significance of this question about the taxation of church property? Simply this—whether the churches shall preserve their power or not. The taxation of church property would deprive the churches of millions of dollars every year. Those millions of dollars are needed for the support of preachers and chapels, for missionary operations, for Bible societies, for tracts. It is said that the churches, as institutions, elevate the spiritual nature of man, and therefore that they ought to go tax free? Do they elevate the spiritual condition of man? Is it their object to elevate the spiritual condition of man? Take up the New York Herald or the New York Tribune any Monday morning and read the reports of sermons there. You will find that in almost every instance the sermon is doctrinal. Scarcely a sermon purely spiritual is preached. What does that import? It imports that the churches do not make it their concern to elevate the religious character of men, but make it their concern to indoctrinate men in their own beliefs. The Episcopal sermons are all Episcopal. The Congregationalist sermons are all Congregational. The establishment of its own theology, and the confirming of the people in its own tenets, is the end and aim of each sect. Is it worth while for the American people to make a present of vast buildings to these people for the purpose of carrying on their theological battles? It is an enormous stretch of generosity on the part of the American people to do any such thing. Why not say to the scientific men, "You may have your laboratories free of expense"? Why not say to the philosophers, "You may have your halls free of expense"? Scientific men are teaching scientific theories; philosophical men are teaching philosophical theories; and the churches are teaching theological theories. Theory for theory, one can claim no advantage over another. Is it said that the churches are a moral police in society? I call attention again to the species of sermons preached there, and I say that they are not a moral police in society. But if all the moral forces of society are to go untaxed, why not leave untaxed all other buildings where instruction of a moral nature is carried on?

No, no; the only reason why churches wish their buildings exempted from taxation is that the money they are thus saved from spending is necessary to their power. Tax the Roman Catholic churches in New York! Tax the Episcopal churches in New York! Why, you would forever make it impossible for them to spread their faith and establish their power. Their machinery would stop; their streams would dry up; their candles would go out. And the poor people who earn money by the sweat of their brows, the hundreds of thousands of artisans and mechanics and laborers who pay for the support of these theological dogmas, would simply have more comfortable homes, better roofs over their heads, better and more plentiful food to eat, better schools for their children, and a better chance for the future for themselves. [Loud applause.] We say the Americans cannot afford to let the church edifices go untaxed. They need their money for other uses. It is a monstrous burden which they cannot and never will be able to carry.

This question is going to be very serious. You smile about it now. You say, "O well! it is not of very great consequence—a few hundreds of thousands of dollars here and there." It is of enormous consequence. The measure is necessary to break down the most stupendous monopoly at present to be found in our society.

Take another example, the Constitutional amendment. What is the significance of the Constitutional amendment? The proposition is simply to introduce the name of God into the Constitution of the United States, and to commit the Constitution and consequently the government of the United States to the Christian religion. It is very simple. It sounds reasonable to a great many very good people. But what is the significance of it? It is an effort on the part of the Protestant churches to form a close alliance with the State, so that they can use the State for their own ecclesiastical purposes—that and nothing else. I don't believe the Protestant people, when they see that, will assent to it. I think that nine out of ten of all the Protestants will repudiate the idea with indignation. I believe there is too much good sense, too much honesty of feeling, too much generosity of sentiment, too much religious charity on the part of the Protestant community in America to tolerate the conception of such a thing. But the leaders mean it. That is what the leaders aim at. In the old city of Prague there is a venerable synagogue, the walls of which, black with grime, have not been cleaned for several hundred years, lest the name of Jehovah, said by tradition to be inscribed somewhere on them, should be erased. The written name alone consecrates the foul interior. The leaders of this movement are of the same mind with those superstitious Hebrews. It is clearly their belief that once get the name of God written up somewhere on the façade of the temple of American liberty, and there will be no necessity for cleaning that temple any more; the mere act of writing that name on the wall will expel vice, crime, and turpitude; will make politics sweet, and convert statesmen into angels. There will probably a different result follow. Once get the name of God written on the wall, and the fear of defacing it or erasing it will cause vice, and crime, and political turpitude, and all national iniquities, to increase and grow and thicken until we never shall be able to get rid of them at all. Once write that name in the Constitution, once commit the Constitution of the United States to anything like a belief in God or Christ, and what follows? The government is committed to Christianity. Laws must be committed to Christianity; and because the government must be consistent with itself, then will follow statutes and edicts, laws and by-laws, excluding this, that, and the other sect, until at last you will find that some of the noblest and best men in society are disfranchised.

I speak advisedly, friends. I am drawing no fancy picture. I attended myself the convention that was held a year ago in New York, and these very gentlemen who propose this amendment said distinctly that if they could have their way nobody should cast a vote who called himself an atheist. Every atheist, every materialist, every infidel, according to the definition of Evangelical Protestantism, every heretic would, as the shades of distinction became more finely drawn, be gradually ruled out, until at last the American government became a government of the saints—of church-members! Are you ready for that? Can you think of that with any patience? Does not the very idea, though it be an idea that may never be realized—does not the very idea strike an American dumb? We say, "Men and women of America, you cannot afford to allow the Protestant religion such power in the country. You cannot afford to allow any system of faith, any confession, any creed, to obtain such an ascendency over any other form of profession as that. If you do, then your republicanism is but a name, and it is a name that will be a stench in the nostrils of the world." [Loud applause.]

We would arrest this struggle of the churches for preëminence and power. We plead for economy. The American people need money. They need all the money they can command. With all their industry, their enterprise, their fortitude, their saving, their thrift, they will hardly get money enough to carry on the necessary business of the country. They cannot afford to spend millions a year for churches, Bibles, tracts; millions a year to convert the heathen in Timbuctoo. They cannot afford it. They need all their money for other purposes. Religion is cheap. Pure religion is cheap. It costs little for people to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences. It costs little to erect suitable houses in which to meet and praise God and celebrate his goodness. You can have all the appliances you need, and pay honestly for them, and be none the poorer. But you cannot give Romanism all that it wants, and Protestantism all that it wants, and yet have enough for yourselves. It is said that if you touch the pocket of the American you touch his tender point. It is true, and it ought to be true. People ought to value their money, for money is a tremendous power. Does not Romanism know it? Indeed it does, and consequently it does not wish its temples to be taxed. Do not Protestants know it? Indeed they do, and therefore they are unwilling that their churches should be taxed.

We plead, therefore, for economy. We say, "Why do ye spend money for that which is not bread, and your labor for that which satisfieth not?"

Again, we plead for peace. We are tired of this endless battle of religions—the incessant wars carried on in the name of the Lord. They have wearied out the patience of the world for ages—battles of theology, and battles of ecclesiasticism, families divided, churches split asunder, and the dream of brotherhood postponed indefinitely (may it not be endlessly?) by the very power that means brotherhood, the very power which means—if it means anything—union, harmony, sympathy, coöperation, combination between the finite and the infinite, between men as brothers, between man and the Infinite.

Just as long as religion means despotism it means conflict. Call the religion by beautiful names—if you will, call it Mohammedanism, call it Buddhism, call it Christianity,—it matters not. The more beautiful it is, the more gracious and graceful, the more dangerous.

Therefore, we take our stand simply in behalf of humanity, in behalf of human harmony and peace and sympathy. We take our stand against all efforts on the part of any church to lift up its head above its neighbors.

Some years ago, we were reading Hugo's great novel, Les Miserables. It opens with a lovely description of a Romish priest, M. Bienvenu Myriel, a devout Catholic, but an humble follower of Jesus of Nazareth. In his parish for years has lived, in a lonely cabin remote from people, a member of the Convention, a revolutionist, democrat, atheist. He was a person abhorred. The peasants avoided him, children were warned against going near his hut. The good priest had never visited him, though troubled in his conscience for his neglect of a human soul with such a burden of guilt. But hearing one day that his terrible parishioner was sick and near his end, M. Myriel plucked up heart of grace and started on his unwelcome mission. The two met face to face for the first and last time—the atheist and the priest. The interview was long, close, sincere. At its close, the old man, exhausted, seemed about to die. The bishop said to him: "This hour belongs to God. Would it not be a pity if we should have met in vain?" The old revolutionist raised his head and said slowly: "I was sixty years old when my country called me to her help. I obeyed. There were abuses—I forgot them; tyrannies—I overthrew them; rights and principles—I announced and adhered to them. I never was rich—I am poor; I succored the oppressed; I consoled the afflicted. True, I tore the cloth from the altar; it was to bind up my country's wound. For this I have been chased, hunted, persecuted, blackened, cursed, spit upon, proscribed. For years, with my white hair, I have been a mark for scorn. The poor, ignorant crowd regard me as one of the damned, and I, hating none, accept the loneliness of hate. I am now eighty-six years old; I am dying; what do you want of me?" "Your blessing," said the bishop, as he bent his knee.

When bishops and priestly men will thus bend the knee to the august spirit of humanity, our task will be ended.

A TRANSLATION FROM LABOULAYE.

West Newton, Mass., Nov. 4, 1874.

Mr. F. E. Abbot:—

I have been reading lately, with considerable pleasure, a book called Paris en Amérique, written by M. Louis Laboulaye, a member of the Académie Française, who is called in France the American Frenchman, owing to his strong predilection for our customs, life, ideas, etc.

I have translated these few pages, thinking you might like to use them, or some part of them, for your paper. The illustration drawn is quite a striking one, I think, and is worthy of thought.

Yours respectfully, B. P. Thurston.

TRANSLATION.

I had been introduced to Mr. W. Desirous of knowing this phœnix that they call a reasoning theologian, and wishing to impress him favorably, I began by congratulating him on the great acquisition his church was making in the person of Mr. T.

"Pardon me," said he, "I am Presbyterian."

"Presbyterian!" cried I, "and you come to compliment a rival? You show a beautiful spirit, for, between you and me, this man, this minister whose hand you take, is a heretic that you would damn."

"I!" said he, much surprised; "I damn no one; that is not Christian."

"I express myself badly, my dear sir; I meant simply that, according to the example of the Divine Shepherd who sought the wandering sheep of Israel, you do not fear to live familiarly with people whose error you detest."

"Mr. T. has edified me this morning," answered he, "and I do not believe him in error."

It was my turn to be astonished. I feared having misunderstood.

"Sir," said I to the young minister, "do you believe that your church teaches the truth?"

"Beyond a doubt; otherwise I should not remain in it."

"Then," replied I, "there are two truths, as there are two churches—a Presbyterian truth and a Congregationalist truth. Perhaps there is also a Baptist, a Methodist, a Lutheran, and even a Catholic truth. I did suppose (excuse my ignorance) that the truth was one, and that the mark of error was to divide it infinitely."

"Doctor," said he, a little touched by my French vivacity, "when you are at sea, and you wish to know the time, what do you do?"

"I ask the time of the sun, and the sun gives it to me."

"The sun gives you the hour. When it is noon at Paris, could you tell me what time it is at Berlin?"

"No; all I know is that a telegram sent from Berlin at eleven o'clock is received at Paris about half-past ten; that is, apparently it arrives thirty minutes before having set out. But then, no matter; I grant you that, when it is noon at Paris, it is one o'clock at Berlin, two at St. Petersburg, and, if you wish, nine in the morning at the Azores, and seven at Quebec. All depends on the meridian."

"Thus," said he, "it is everywhere the same sun, and it is nowhere the same hour; how is that?"

"I answer you, It is the same sun seen from different points."

"One more question. Among all these times which is the true one?"

"A strange question! The time is true for each, since for each the sun rises or seems to rise at a different point."

"Very well; I see we are agreed in theology as in astronomy."

"Mr. W.," said I, "I begin to understand you. The truth for you is the sun; that we see each according to the horizon which shuts him in. It is noon doubtless at the Presbyterian Church, while the hour has passed for the Baptists, and is not yet come for the Methodists."

"For each church, I will venture to say for each Christian, I believe there is a different horizon. Birth and education give us the point of departure; it is for us now to march towards this truth which calls us, to approach it ever by force of study and virtue. I am aware that there may be churches better enlightened by the divine light, but yet I do not doubt that in the most obscure church one may find the best Christian. It is a great advantage to be placed near the sun; it is not always a reason for seeing it better. There you see why I prefer my church, and why, nevertheless, I damn no one."

"My young friend," said I, "your illusions have something seducing; the feeling which gives them birth is worthy, but the first breath of reason will dissipate them. If each Christian sees the truth in his way, there is no truth. We come back to the scepticism of Montaigne. You will not find a dogma that one will not attack, not a belief that one will not shake. Your theory, so Christian in appearance, condemns you to universal doubt; it arrives at universal incredulity."

"Doctor, it seems to me you criticise the human mind; that is, the work of God. From the diversity and weakness of our eyes one might also conclude that we see nothing. It would be the same logic and the same sophism. In the natural studies, each of us takes only the part that he can appropriate to himself; do we see that this diversity of opinions ruins science? In physics is there a single theory which may escape discussion? Will you deny, however, that a physical truth exists?"

"The comparison is bad. What remains of the physical science of thirty years ago? The truth of yesterday has become the error of to-day."

"No; the error of yesterday has fallen as dead leaves fall; the truth has not changed, for it is, under another name, only the knowledge of Nature, and Nature does not change."

"I grant you that; but religious truth is of another order than natural truth."

"If I should concede this disputable hypothesis, we should be no further. Whatever be the number and variety of the bodies which fill the world, we have only our eyes with which to see them; what we do not see does not exist for us. Whatever be the nature of a truth, we have only our mind to understand it. Is our soul double? God has given each of us, in order to discover natural truths, a searching, restless, active faculty that we call reason. May there be in us another power, which, without individual effort, receives the religious truth in the same way that a mirror reflects the object presented to it? If this faculty do not exist, the diversity of religious opinions is acquired; it results from the age, education, country, the natural energy of our mind or its activity. If, on the contrary, this faculty exist, we ought all to think alike, as we all breathe alike, by a law of Nature. Such is not the case, God be thanked! He has left to each of us the liberty of misconceiving him, in order to give to each of us the right of loving him. This liberty which frightens you is our most beautiful appanage; it is that which makes of religion a love, and of faith a virtue."

"But," I cried, "you are the prophet of anarchy. You dissipate the most beautiful dream of humanity. One faith, one law, one king,—such was the device of the middle ages, a motto which every man wore deep in his heart. What do you offer us in exchange? Confusion. What sort of a church is it where each speaks a different language, and does not understand that of his neighbor?"

"I love unity as much as you," replied he, "but unity is not uniformity. Look at Nature: what an admirable whole! And yet there are not two trees, two plants, two flowers, not two leaves which are alike. From the infinite variety God draws the living and perfect unity. Why should not the law of Nature be the law of humanity? Why should not the voice of each creature have its place in this concert of praises that the earth sings to the Lord?"

THE BOSTON RADICAL CLUB.

BY THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON.

The winter meetings of this tolerably well-known Club began, as usual, on the third Monday of October, with an essay by Professor Charles C. Everett, of Harvard University, on "The Tragic Element in Literature and Life." It was followed by an animated talk, in which Rev. Dr. Bartol, Rev. Dr. Miner, Messrs. Weiss, Longfellow, Cranch, and Abbot, Mrs. Cheney, Miss Peabody, and others took part. The interest that attaches to this Club is something a little remarkable, showing itself as it does in newspaper reports, in sharp criticism, in frequent attacks, and in occasional unexpected obituaries. Any novelty that attached to these meetings must long since, one would have supposed, have passed away. There are many other clubs in Boston—social, political, literary, scientific. Half a dozen meet at the Parker House every Saturday, and others meet monthly or quarterly. Why is it that this particular Club attracts such exceptional attention? It certainly does not invite remark; it meets at a private house; the members present cards at the door; professional reporters are excluded. All authentic reports are written by members of the Club, and sometimes even these have been prohibited. The Club does not aim to be a propaganda; it takes no missionary attitude, has no work for which advertising is essential. It is simply a modest, private gathering, converted by public attention into an affair of general interest.

I suppose that this special attention has been due to a combination of circumstances. First, the name and fact of radicalism have a certain value; not so much because radical thought is better than conservative thought, or even more varied, as because radicalism usually offers a freer platform, and thus secures the presence of a greater range of opinion. In theology, for instance, a "radical" meeting which contrives to bring in among its speakers, or even among its auditors, such men as Rev. Drs. Clarke, Hedge, Stowe, Manning, and Miner, such men as Phillips Brooks and Wendell Phillips—radical in all else, but conservative in theology,—has a guaranty of interest such as cannot attach to the ablest convention of evangelical men alone. For such conventions do not invite the radicals, and you must, therefore, go to the radical meeting if you would meet them both.

Again, another thing which enhances this effect of variety is the aspect of the twin houses where the Club meets. The old drawing-rooms, the family pictures, the antique andirons that support the open fire, the very arm-chair in which the speaker sits, with its traditions of Versailles and the French Revolution—all this makes a picturesque background for the radicalism of to-day. This combination of old and new always reminds me of a day in the old library at Merton College, Oxford, when I turned from the mediæval alcoves, with their great tomes yet chained to the desks, to the modern record on the table, showing that the last book taken from the library that day was a volume of Mazzini's works.

But what has contributed more than anything, I think, to the popularity of the Radical Club has been the real zest given to the conversation by the presence of both sexes. I remember that on one occasion, after the meeting of the Club, I went to a gathering of very similar nature, composed of men only. These men were to a considerable extent the same, and, as it chanced, the essayist was the same as in the morning; but it seemed to me that the conversation, good as it was, was lacking in a certain piquant and varied flavor, such as the presence of clever women gives to the Radical Club. I am not here speaking of individual women, though certainly no one has contributed more to the learning of the Club than Miss Peabody, to its clear thinking than Mrs. Cheney, or to its wit than Mrs. Howe. But I am sure that men themselves talk better, on the whole, where women take part in the conversation, and when it comes to arranging the plan and machinery of such gatherings, the tact and energy of women afford an immense level; and the Radical Club has always had in this respect some of the characteristics of a French salon, its most important element having been all along contributed by one who takes no part in its discussions.

The faults of the Club lie on the surface, and are probably best known to the members themselves. Fortunately, these members supply to some extent a mutual corrective. If some are combative, others are soothing; if some are too stimulating, others are repressive; if some have too much specific gravity, others are marked by that convenient trait called by Edmund Quincy "specific levity." There is seldom danger that anything calling itself "radical" will not indulge in self-criticism enough; the tendency is apt to be quite the other way. As to the criticism from without, it has usually been of a kind to do little good, because founded on some misconception of the deliberate plan and purpose of the Club. By full intent and premeditation it has chosen to be theoretical rather than practical; literary rather than scientific. Not that either the scientific or the practical has been wanting; but that these departments of interest were held to be already provided for in other directions, and so less pressing than the other demands. Boston is full of scientific and practical associations, and the members of this Club do their full part in these, as the lists of officers will show; but the need of an informal debating society for points of literature, art, philosohpy, and even theology was that which created the Radical Club, and this still keeps it in being.

And even on this ground it must be remembered that the Club was originally intended as a place of relaxation rather than a scene of labor, and that its proper test is the refreshment and variety it has thus afforded rather than anything which it has systematically brought to pass. It has certainly been a pleasant place of meeting for its members; and this is the main reason, I fancy, why the newspaper reports have been tolerated; because, while they often did great injustice to individuals who were misreported, they gave such pleasure to absent members. And beyond this pleasure, the Club has often done real good by eliciting those flashes of thought that come from the contact of mind with mind. The most meditative flintstone cannot develop out of its own consciousness in a hundred years as many sparks as another flintstone can extract from it in five seconds. Then the criticism always frankly given by the members on any paper read before them is a great blessing to the writer, albeit sometimes mingled with shame and humiliation.

So complimentary is always the opening of these comments, and so keen the subsequent criticism, that Mrs. Howe once compared it to the ancient punishment whereby an offender was first smeared with honey and then hung up to be stung to death by wasps. Yet the wasps, at any rate, take an innocent pleasure in it, and I can answer for one case, at least, where the victim has found it a very useful form of martyrdom. As Sir Arthur Helps says, you should always read your essay to a friend; for even if his criticisms do not show common sense, they will, at least, give you the common nonsense which is almost as valuable. I honestly think that less nonsense has been inflicted upon the community in print through these frank discussions of the Radical Club; and this alone, perhaps, would be a sufficient reason for its existence.—Independent, November 5.

ADVERTISING VERSUS DEATH.

Whether a Boston paper is right in suggesting that the Rev. Rowland Connor wrote the Tribune's obituary of the Radical Club we do not know, though the initials "R. W. L." might easily be assumed by a "Rowland." That article was quite a godsend to the unwary religious press, which did not conceal its gratification at this sign of the decay of unbelief. If we did not join in their pæan, it was partly because we were not sure that the sign was a sound one, and partly because such an obituary was electrical enough to galvanize back into life a pretty dead corpse. The decease of a subjective transcendental club is some proof that transcendentalism is falling, but not that unbelief is; for there is a fashion in unbelief, as in bonnets, and the popular materialism or positivism of to-day may have quite as many followers as had the now obsolescent transcendentalism of yesterday. We expected, however, the resurrection of the Radical Club, and Colonel Higginson announces it in another page. We have no objection to its beginning a new lease of life, though, if that is desired, the Club must pardon us for suggesting that it had better not forbid reports by its members. Thus far, if the Club has had vital vigor within itself, it has also been sustained pretty well by its advertising. Its members may claim that it "does not invite remark," and may regard the interest that attaches to it as "remarkable;" but to us it has seemed just about as strange as the success of Müller's orphan asylums, which depend on prayer, and never "invite" contributions. Müller is a famous advertiser of his charity, and so are these accomplished littérateurs of their club, for which shrewdness we heartily praise both Müller and the Radicals; but we do not wonder so much as they at the interest they manage to excite.—Independent, November 5.

CHRISTIAN MEN! CAN YOU VOTE FOR AN ATHEIST?

The notorious fact that one of the candidates on the Republican ticket, and that for the important position of a legislator, is a bold, open, and avowed ATHEIST led us to believe that some one of the clergy in our midst—sentinels on the watch-towers of Zion—would sound the note of alarm, and warn professing Christian men against the danger of placing power in the hands of an unbeliever and scoffer. We have waited thus far in vain for such warning from such source, and now regard it our duty, as a journalist, to lay the facts before the public. Our neglect to do so before this has been the subject of adverse criticism by religious men, our patrons, and friends.

The reader will bear ready witness that never has the Geneva Gazette shown a spirit of intolerance toward any person, whether a candidate for office or not, on account of religious faith, sect, or connection. The Protestant and Catholic, Jew and Gentile, the Churchman, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Congregationalist, Universalist, or whatever creed acknowledged or professed, has in these columns been treated with like respect, courtesy, and consideration for honestly entertained views founded upon a common recognition of One Supreme Being, the Creator and Governor of all, to whom all must render an account in the life hereafter for the deeds done in the body.

But this spirit of tolerance for diverse creeds should not and does not include him who believes not at all—him who, possessing all the advantages of having received an enlightened Christian education, discards as fiction all the teachings and doctrines of Holy Writ.

Hence we feel fully justified in stating and criticising the scepticism of Col. CHAS. D. MILLER, the Republican candidate for Assembly. Let it be known, therefore, throughout this district in which he is asking the votes of Christian men to constitute him a law-maker, that he is A RANK ATHEIST. He has in the hearing of the editor of this paper and writer of this article, and of others present at the same time, denied the existence of a Supreme Being, the Creator and Governor of the Universe and all that therein is. He at the same time characterized the Holy Bible as a mere work of fiction, unworthy of credence, full of contradictions, and profuse with indecencies. We have the authority of a most respectable townsman—a member of the First Presbyterian Church—that in conversation with him Mr. Miller blasphemously characterized our Lord Jesus Christ as a "panderer to lust and licentiousness" in atoning the crime of adultery.

He denies the immortality of the soul or a life hereafter; regards death in case of man and brute alike as annihilation—the end of all.

To sum up, he is the veriest disciple of Voltaire and Tom Paine.

The scepticism of CHAS. D. MILLER in regard to the Christian religion is no secret in Geneva, at least with those who are at all intimate with him. If any have doubts about it, let him plainly put the question to him, and we have the utmost confidence that he will not deny the allegations above made, for he is bold and explicit in declaring his principles. If his candidacy or other causes have wrought a change of heart within the last three weeks, we shall be most rejoiced to chronicle his conversion. But if he has not changed, the question must come home with solemn reflection and admonition to every Christian heart, "Can I conscientiously vote for CHARLES D. MILLER, THE ATHEIST, to represent an educated, intelligent, Christian constituency in the halls of legislation?"—Geneva (N. Y.) Gazette, Oct. 30.

THE SUPPRESSION OF BLASPHEMY.

THE INDEX seems anxious to know what is to become of it when the Religious Amendment movement triumphs, as it one day certainly will. It says:

"An extraordinary article on 'Liberty of Speech,' showing the secret intent of the Christian Amendment party, is contained in the Christian Statesman of August 8. The editor takes the ground that if any man's 'teachings and efforts' 'in any way weaken the foundations of law and good government,' then it 'becomes the imperative duty of the State to suppress both deed and word.' Now we credit the Statesman with the courage of its opinions, and with this belief solicit a reply to three plain questions:—

"1. Do our own teachings and efforts in any way weaken the foundations of law and good government?

"2. Is it the duty of the State to suppress THE INDEX accordingly?

"3. Would the editor of the Statesman, if he represented the State, and had the power, suppress it?

"Will the Statesman please answer these questions briefly, and to the point, as we would answer any similar questions it might choose to put?"

To the above insinuation that we have a "secret intent," which we dare not at present frankly avow, we have nothing more to say than that the whole course of this journal, and of the movement which it represents, has been candid to a fault. According to the testimony of THE INDEX itself, there is nothing of crafty policy in connection with the Religious Amendment movement.

In reply to the questions put, we answer frankly and briefly that, if we represented the State, and had the power, we would suppress blasphemy, wherever found, as an evil undermining the foundations of law and good government. If THE INDEX were proved to be a blasphemous sheet, we would suppress it. So far as we have known it, it has not been such a sheet.

Having answered our catechist, let us examine the principles involved in the answer given.

The propriety of legislation for the suppression of blasphemy need hardly be vindicated in a country where the statute-books of the majority of the States contain harmonious laws upon the subject, enforced by numerous judicial decisions. The law of Connecticut reads: "Every person who shall be guilty of blasphemy against God, or either of the persons of the Holy Trinity, or the Christian religion, or the Holy Scriptures shall be punished by fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in a common jail not exceeding one year; and may also be bound to his good behavior at the discretion of the court." (Revised Statutes, ch. x., § 132.) With some variations of expression, and differences in the penalty, the same enactment, substantially, is found on the statute-books of Delaware, Indiana, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Tennessee, Vermont, Virginia, and West Virginia. Some of the other States, as Iowa and North Carolina, have this form of enactment: "If any person of the age of ten years and upwards shall profanely curse or damn, or profanely swear by the name of God, Jesus Christ, or the Holy Ghost, in any court of justice, or within hearing of any religious assemblage,"—then follows the penalty.

In accordance with these laws, decisions have been rendered in the courts of our States—decisions that have never been overruled. (See, for example, 8 Johnson, 290; 11 Sergeant and Rawle, 394; 2 Harrington, 553; 2 Strobhart, 508; Thacher's Criminal Cases, 346; 8 Connecticut Reports, 375; 2 Parker's Criminal Cases, 14.) It is of no avail to say that these laws are largely now a dead letter. That is too true—the legitimate fruit, in a large measure, of a religiously defective Constitution. But these enactments and decisions have not been repealed and overruled. If there were only moral stamina enough in any community, these laws for the suppression of blasphemy might be, as they ought to be, enforced; and decisions like those of Judges Kent, Duncan, Clayton, Swift, and Wilde would be again solemnly rendered from the bench of justice.

An important principle must be kept distinctly in view, however, in determining what is blasphemy in the eye of the civil law. In the earliest legislation in our country on the subject, a distinction was clearly drawn between spoken or written arguments, conducted in an earnest and honest spirit of inquiry and investigation, and scurrilous and malicious reviling of the truths of religion. The language of Judge Duncan, of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, is here most explicit: "No author or printer who fairly and conscientiously promulgates the opinions with whose truth he is impressed, for the benefit of others, is amenable as a criminal. A malicious and mischievous intention is, in such a case, the broad boundary between right and wrong; and it is to be collected from the offensive levity, scurrilous and opprobrious language, and other circumstances, whether the act of the party was malicious. . . . No society can tolerate a wilful and despiteful attempt to subvert its religion, no more than it would to break down its laws. A general, malicious, and deliberate attempt to overthrow Christianity, general Christianity,—this is the line of indication where crime commences, and the offence becomes the subject of penal visitation." (Updegraph v. The Commonwealth. 11 Sergeant and Rawle, 394.)

If THE INDEX, instead of being made up of calm, courteous, earnest, and scholarly discussions of the gravest questions, were filled with low, scurrilous, and malignant attacks on Christianity, we would, if clothed with the requisite civil authority, insist on a change of its character on penalty of suppression.

It may be asked: "But is not the able, earnest, and courteous INDEX doing more to subvert the principles of good government, according to the Christian standard, than any low and scurrilous sheet could possibly do? And if so, why not more promptly suppress it than even the other?" To this we reply that truth has nothing to fear from honest inquiry, and such discussions as we have often read in the columns of THE INDEX, assailing the most fundamental principles of Christianity, will stimulate thought, and elicit clearer statements of the truth. They will undoubtedly confirm many in error, and possibly change the views of a few; yet we would not suppress them, except by confronting them and overcoming them with the power of God's truth.

But, on the other hand, the abusive, gross, and oftentimes indecent language in which hostility to Christianity has so generally expressed itself cannot be met by argument. The power of truth cannot be brought to bear upon this form of opposition. This spirit of malice has no claim upon the forbearance of the State. The strong arm of the law must interfere to resent the insult to the community, and force the criminal into at least outward respect for social order. That the columns of THE INDEX, hostile as it is to Christianity, may never be disgraced by blasphemy is our cherished hope. Its editor is an unbeliever in what we accept as the only true religion; but we have mistaken the man if he himself justifies the reviling and blaspheming, by tongue or pen, of the religion which he rejects.—Christian Statesman, Oct. 10.

CHRISTIAN THEISM

A TEST OF MEMBERSHIP IN THE "PATRIOTIC ORDER SONS OF AMERICA."

The following is an abstract from a letter we received lately:—

EDITOR OF CAMP NEWS:

Sir,—My attention has lately been called to the Order which you represent. As you are well aware, the subject of Church and State union in America is beginning to receive considerable attention in various quarters. I hope I may be pardoned, therefore, for asking information concerning the principles underlying the Patriotic Order Sons of America. The Christian Statesman of your city is the organ of what is popularly known as the "God in the Constitution" party. This party claims that the outcome of its results would not be a union of Church and State; but since we are a Christian people our government should be based on Christian features. On the other hand is that increasing body of rationalists, of various schools, whose leading organ is THE INDEX (Boston), whose aim is the complete secularization of the government, as set forth in its nine Demands of Liberalism and Religious Freedom Amendment, at variance with your Order. Among those demands are the taxation of church property; the abolition of Bible-reading in schools; the abolition of all laws regarding Sunday as the Sabbath; the substitution of simple affirmation for oaths, with the pains and penalty for perjury; the abolition of the office of chaplain in the pay of the government, etc. What is the attitude of your Order, especially towards the secular party? I understand it is opposed to the encroachments of Catholicism as well as Protestantism. I presume it is at variance with sectarianism, but not with what is known as Christianity. . . . In your Constitution I observe the qualification for membership, among other things, is the belief in God, or a Supreme Being, as the Creator and Preserver of the universe. I, of course, take it this is the God of Deism, a God outside of Nature,—the outcome of a dualistic philosophy. I further take it this is not a God of revelation, but a God revealed intuitively. The science of our day, based on the doctrine of evolution, makes creation an impossibility; therefore there can be no Creator or God outside of Nature. The outcome of this philosophy is monism. Formulated in brief, it reduces Nature to "one force throughout space; one law throughout time." The question is, Is that force or power intelligent or unintelligent? If the latter, it is certainly not less but higher than the former. Now the question is, Would the belief in either of these "Scientific Gods" render a candidate ineligible? I am aware that formerly such views would have been pronounced atheistic. . . . I accept no other authority than reason and science, let the verdict be dualism or monism.

As an Order, we are set for the defence of every true principle of American liberty. We are opposed to a union of Church and State, believing that such union would prove fatal to both. We are opposed to removing the Bible from the public schools, because it is the greatest expositor of virtue, and the charter of eternal life. We are opposed to the encroachments of Catholicism, Mormonism, and all other "isms" upon national freedom and our institutions. We are opposed to "a complete secularization of our government and the free-school system," as might already be inferred; and one of our qualifications for membership is the belief in a Supreme Being as set forth in an article in another column of this issue, entitled, "Our Faith versus Scepticism.—Camp News (Phila.), Nov. 1, 1874: organ of Patriotic Order Sons of America.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL ON HIS DEFENCE.

Professor Tyndall recently delivered in Manchester a lecture on "Crystalline and Molecular Forces." In concluding his discourse, after some beautiful experiments showing the constructive power of molecular forces as following what he might call their architectural instincts, he said:—

The way in which these atoms build themselves together is to me perfectly astounding. You have here a play of power almost as wonderful as the play of vitality itself. Perhaps I may have expressed myself too strongly in calling this beautiful experiment astonishing. Still I must say, although I have seen it, to speak moderately, hundreds and hundreds of times, I have never looked upon it without feelings of astonishment. And depend upon it, trust me, that the revelations of science are not in the least degree calculated to lessen our feelings of astonishment. We are surrounded by wonders and mysteries everywhere. I have sometimes—not sometimes, but often—in the springtide watched the advance of the sprouting leaves, and of the grass, and of the flowers, and observed the general joy of opening life in Nature, and I have asked myself this question: Can it be that there is no being or thing in Nature that knows more about these things than I do? Do I in my ignorance represent the highest knowledge of these things existing in this universe? Ladies and gentlemen, the man who puts that question to himself, if he be not a shallow man—if he be a man capable of being penetrated by a profound thought,—will never answer the question by professing the creed of atheism, which has been so lightly attributed to me. I will only detain you one moment more. Everywhere throughout our planet we notice this tendency of the ultimate particles of matter to run into symmetric forms. The very molecules appear inspired with a desire for union and growth, and the question of questions at the present day is,—and it is one, I fear, which will not be solved in our day, but will continue to agitate and occupy thinking minds after we have departed,—this question of questions is, How far does this wondrous display of molecular force extend? Does it give the movement of the sap of trees? I reply with confidence, Assuredly it does. Does it give us the beating of our own hearts, the warmth of our own bodies, the circulation of our own blood, and all that thereon depends? This is a point on which I offer no opinion to-night. I have brought you to the edge of a battle-field into which I don't intend to enter, and from which I have barely escaped, somewhat spattered and begrimed, but without much loss of heart or hope. It now only remains for me not to enter this battle-field, but to point out to you the position of the contending hosts. You can pass on by almost imperceptible gradations from this wonderful display of force that I have been able to make manifest to your eyes here to-night to the lowest forms of vegetable life. You pass from them to other forms higher, and so up to the highest. I have spoken of contending hosts, and their position is this: One class of thinkers supposes that these actions of crystals that you have seen formed before you make the passage from that crystalline action to the lowest forms of life, and from them to higher forms, up to the highest. I say one class of thinkers regards this as the growth of a single natural process. They grasp, as it were, this act of life, this development of life, as an indissolubly connected whole, one great organic growth from the beginning. Others again say that it is not possible to pass from inorganic, as we are pleased to call it—for remember it is only human language we can use,—from the inorganic to the organic without a distinctive creative act; and so with regard to the forms that we observe not only in the fossil world. These forms, it is alleged, or considered, also require for their introduction special creative acts. Here there are two perfectly distinct positions, and if you look abroad you will find men of equal honesty, equal earnestness, equal intelligence, ranging themselves on two opposite sides in relation to this question. Which are right and which are wrong is, I submit, a question for grave consideration, and not for abuse and hard names. I am afraid that many of the fears that are now entertained on these subjects really have their roots in a kind of scepticism. It is not always those who are charged with scepticism that are the real sceptics; and I confess it is a matter of some grief to me to see able, useful, and courageous men running to and fro upon the earth, wringing their hands over the threatened destruction of their ideals. I would say, if I dared, to such men—I would exhort them to cast out such scepticism, for this fear has its root in scepticism. In the human mind we have the substratum of all ideals, and as surely as string responds to string when the proper note is sounded, so surely, when words of truth and nobleness are uttered by a living human soul, will those words have a resonant response on other souls; and in this faith I abide, and in this way I leave the question.—Advertiser.

A CITIZEN OF A country town, noted for his dishonesty, was lately taken very ill; and becoming alarmed sent for a clergyman, who came to see him, and laid down the divine law to him with great faithfulness and emphasis. The sick man was much affected, and said, "Well, parson, I think you're right, and I've made up my mind that if I get well I shall in the future live principally honest."

COUNTING COST.

Who counts the cost of worthy task
Will find the count full dear;
Already lost who stays to ask—
"Shall I, then, be sincere?"

The question thousands more hath slain,
On Virtue's doubtful field,
Than e'er the lusty tyrant Gain
Hath reft of Honor's shield.

Oh! guard thy mind, thou perilled youth,
'Gainst Question's fatal dart;
And, walled around with seamless Truth,
Protect thy scathless heart.

But let the outer ramparts fall
Of worldly ease and pelf;
If Manhood's Citadel be all
That stands,—it stands Thyself.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 19, 1874.

Does the Golden Age spell our name with "two t's" on purpose "to tease" us?

Mr. Frothingham has very kindly written out his Providence address from the reports of it, expressly for The Index; and it is sure to receive the closest attention.

The Index will be sent to any name not now on our mail-list until January 1, 1876, on receipt of $3.00 in advance. Here is a chance to receive the paper for fourteen months at the price of twelve months. Please tell your friends and neighbors of this liberal offer, and help us to increase our circulation.

The Boston Radical Club listened last Monday to a very interesting lecture by Professor E. S. Morse on certain aspects of the subject of Evolution. He pointed out the close affinities of birds and reptiles, both of whose characteristics were found in the Dinosaurians of the Cretaceous period. Mr. Bradlaugh, "Mark Twain," and other distinguished persons were present.

Sample copies of The Index will be sent to any address free of charge. It is a great favor to send lists of names, with the address in each case, of those who may possibly subscribe to the paper. If you cannot take time to canvass for it, can you not write out the names of all the persons among your acquaintances who might be induced to subscribe by reading a specimen copy?

Rev. F. C. Williams sends a communication this week to The Index in correction of the report we copied week before last from the Norfolk County Gazette. He says he should not have voted to exclude any of A. J. Davis' books from the public library, though he did use the language quoted of some of his non-theological works. All that concerns the public is the votes in this matter. Every man is entitled to his own opinion of all books, and has the right to express it freely. We are glad to learn that the report gave a wrong impression of Mr. Williams' position on this question, as it led us to suppose he would have voted for exclusion, and on this ground alone criticised him. We learn that the agitation of the subject has resulted in the admission of all the books donated by Mr. Giles to the library, and all sensible persons will be pleased to know it.

Referring to the frank announcement of Rev. J. H. Clifford, of North Andover, that he could no longer "call himself a Christian," we said lately that we hoped he had "counted the cost of his sincerity." Some ringing verses in our "poet's corner" this week show the fearlessness that animates him, and the high spirit with which he spurns the thought of "counting the cost" when sincerity is at stake. Perhaps our original meaning needs a little explanation. The courage that never gives out is the courage that thinks—the courage that is a principle rather than an impulse, and coolly measures the risks it runs. Certain grave practical consequences, likely to overtake sooner or later the young minister (even among the Unitarians) who refuses to be influenced by regard for them in the utterance of his innermost convictions, had better be looked squarely in the face before they are incurred. It takes sometimes a finer bravery to walk open-eyed into poverty than to rush on a row of bayonets; for, while the one fires the soul with the inspiration of high heroism, the other daunts it with images of long-continued and corroding care, of depressing struggles with the wolf at the door, of hardships and privations, not for self alone, but for others dearer than self. Soured or querulous minds, ground down by troubles unanticipated, hungry for sympathy or admiration which seldom follows on the heels of obscure and untrumpeted sacrifices, are too often the fruit of a courage which has forgotten to "count the cost" beforehand. Be sincere at any cost—but know the cost betimes!

THE STONE OF SISYPHUS.

In the Golden Age of October 24, this annoying series of misstatements was printed in the editorial columns:—

"Mr. F. E. Abbot has taken pains to say that the Free Religious Association is anti-Christian, and not a neutral or independent body of truth-seekers, as Messrs. Ames and Calthrop have represented. He framed the Constitution, and selected its terms on purpose to commit it to an attitude of hostility to Christianity. Therefore, all sympathy expressed for that Association by a professedly Christian body is manifestly and ridiculously inconsistent. There is something admirable in the unflinching logic and courageous candor of Mr. Abbot in avowing this position, however ungracious it may seem to push away the proffered fellowships of such able and truly noble minds as James Freeman Clarke, Mr. Calthrop, Mr. Ames, Robert Collyer, Mr. Chadwick, and a score of other men. If Mr. Abbot's view of the Constitution and attitude of the Free Religious Association is correct and supported by its members generally, that Association will lose the interest and sympathy of a great many intelligent and cultivated people who have regarded it with friendliness, and watched its progress with sympathy and hope. It is hard to see why that body committed itself to a position of hostility to Christianity any more than any other religion, for such a position is essentially unscientific and unphilosophical. It simply creates another sect when there are too many already, and inflames the spirit of partisanship which all honest truth-seekers ought to allay. Certainly the attitude of Mr. Higginson, who insists on living his own life and doing his own work in his own way without going out of his path to smash egg-shells, is much the truer and nobler of the two. It is the sympathy of religions and not their antipathies that reason and reverence alike require us to seek."

We did not "take pains" to say what is here put into our mouth.

1. The Free Religious Association, as such, takes no position either for or against Christianity, by any explicit statement in its Constitution. It simply plants itself on Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. These principles we, as a private member who cannot of himself commit the Association to anything, believe to be consistent with the anti-Christian attitude alone; for which reason we find our own attitude to be that, and nothing else. But other members take such attitude as their own reason and conscience, not ours, dictate; and, as a matter of fact, very few of them apparently think our view of Free Religion is correct. They do not speak for us, nor we for them: each member, from President to "high private," speaks for himself alone. All the members say in common nothing that is not said in the Constitution, and that says only freedom and fellowship in religion. We are not afraid or unwilling to stand with a very small minority, or alone if need be; but we are afraid to seek to strengthen our own position by misrepresenting that of our comrades. They are no more anti-Christian than they say they are: wait till they speak before you class them with us in our attitude towards Christianity. We know these men and women well; they love truth just as much as we do; and when they think we are right, they will say so. We are in no hurry to be "indorsed," and see no good reason why the Golden Age should make it appear that we claim their indorsement. The world is big enough for every tub to stand on its own bottom without crowding its neighbor. That is what we stand for—freedom and fellowship in religion. In the name of human intelligence, is not that intelligible?

2. The Free Religious Association is an "independent body of truth-seekers, as Messrs. Ames and Calthrop have represented"—"neutral" also, if freedom and fellowship in religion are neutral, but otherwise not. Which alternative is the true one, let every man judge for himself: we have no right to speak for any one except ourself alone. We believe, as a matter of private opinion, that freedom is not neutral with respect to any special religion, but hostile to every religion just so far as it insists on its speciality, and friendly to every religion just so far as it emphasizes its own universal truths. Is not that, too, intelligible?

3. We did not "frame the Constitution;" we only helped to frame it. Mr. Potter and Mr. Towne and we drafted it together; but Mr. Potter contributed the most towards it, as it was finally agreed upon by the three. Mr. Frothingham afterwards suggested the addition of the phrase "fellowship in the spirit," before the Constitution was submitted to the other friends.

4. We did not "select its terms on purpose to commit it to an attitude of hostility to Christianity." In the first place, we still considered and called ourself a Christian at that time (February, 1867). In the next place, the only part of the Constitution which we contributed outright and unmodified was the beginning of the second article: "Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations." This was considered by the others as so fixed a principle of the whole movement as to be a mere matter of course; but it appeared to us too important to be taken for granted and left unsaid, and it shows conclusively how little we desired to "commit" the young Association either to or against Christianity.

5. There is nothing "admirable" in "pushing away the proffered fellowships" of such men as are named by the Golden Age. Their personal fellowship we have never pushed away, nor ever mean to push away. We accept and reciprocate it, just so far as offered, with heartiness and honesty, on the simple ground of our common humanity and mutual respect. What we did push away was an expression of sympathy by an organized Christian body for another organized body whose principles we believe to be fundamentally anti-Christian in their tendency—whatever other people may believe them to be. Such sympathy as it was proposed to express could not possibly exist between two organizations based on irreconcilable principles, Christianity and Freedom; and we did push away the unreality of it. The ecclesiastical fellowship of Messrs. Clarke, Calthrop, Ames, Collyer, Chadwick, and the rest, we did not and do not want; their personal fellowship, so far as it seeks us, we prize. That is, we sympathize with their gracious humanity, but not with their Christianity: truthfulness, so much more important even than fellowship, forbids that.

We cannot suppose for a moment that the Golden Age had any purpose of misrepresenting our recent article on "Unitarian Sympathies," to which it refers; though it has certainly been careless in representing it, to a hardly excusable degree. But is it not almost enough, good reader, to make one despair of the English language, when five years of reiterated statement cannot lodge such simple distinctions as we have drawn above even in the minds of brilliant and cultivated editors? It is the old story of Sisyphus, doomed to roll a huge stone up a hill forever, only to see it roll thundering down again to the foot.

"THE SUPPRESSION OF BLASPHEMY."

What is "blasphemy"? In general, defamation of character by libel or injurious speech of any kind; more particularly, in the theological sense of the word, defamation of God's character, irreverent or impious language concerning him.

There is no crime of "blasphemy" of which the State may take cognizance. The word is not now used to describe injury done to the reputation of a human being, which is described legally by other words. As to injury done to the reputation of God, the State has no authority to take cognizance of any such offence, supposing that it exists. The "blasphemy laws" which still stand on the Statute books of many States, including Massachusetts, are practically a dead letter, and ought to be expunged. No one, however bigoted, dares to appeal to them now for punishment of offenders against his own notions of propriety of speech respecting God. If anybody offends good taste or decency in this respect, his only punishment in this world is the repugnance excited towards himself in the minds of his fellow-citizens; while as to the "other world" the opinion of The Index would not carry much weight. To attempt to execute legal penalties upon the "blasphemer" would not be tolerated to-day, at least in the civilized parts of the United States. The present "blasphemy laws" are simply a relic of superstition which survives only to be disregarded and despised. They are dangerous, however, while unrepealed; for a change of circumstances might make them most powerful weapons for the suppression of free speech. They ought to be repealed everywhere.

An article is copied in another column from the Philadelphia Christian Statesman, of October 10, which discusses this subject, and is worthy of special consideration. We wish to disclaim our former expression, "secret intent," which the Statesman regards as an "insinuation" of "crafty policy in connection with the Religious Amendment movement." Our phrase was hasty, and we retract it. We should have better expressed the truth (and our own conviction) if we had said—"the inevitable tendency" or "real logic" of that movement. So far as we know and believe, the Christian Statesman is singularly free from anything like insincerity, crafty policy, or underhand methods of any sort. It presses its strong convictions with fairness, openness, and courage, and sets a lesson in this respect worth studying by most Evangelical journals.

But we do not think the Statesman really answers the questions it undertakes to answer. It had declared the duty of suppressing "any man's teachings and efforts" which in any way "weaken the foundations of law and good government." Knowing that it considers Christianity to be the only basis of "law and good government," we inquired whether it would favor the suppression of THE INDEX, which opposes Christianity so far as the editor is concerned. The Statesman only replies that it would suppress THE INDEX, if it were "blasphemous." Is "blasphemy," then, the only form of speech that "weakens the foundations of law and good government"? Are we to understand that, in the Statesman's opinion, THE INDEX does not weaken them? Is it willing to say explicitly as much as that, and to avow the belief that "able, earnest, and courteous" argument has less influence on the public mind, less power to impair faith in Christianity, its accepted basis of "law and good government," than coarse and vulgar abuse? It strikes us that, the higher the tone and the greater the ability of an anti-Christian sheet, so much the sooner would the original declaration of the Statesman require it to suppress such a sheet. The first of our three questions is not really answered at all. Will the Statesman not answer it with its accustomed directness and pointedness? The question is important, for many people believe that the Christian Amendment would greatly impair, if not destroy, the liberty of the press. Let the point be fully and explicitly met. It will be so met, if the opinion we have above expressed of the Statesman is correct.

ANSWERING ONE'S OWN PRAYERS.

The Young Men's Christian Association have recently issued the following letter:—

November 5, 1874.

My dear Sir,—It gives me pleasure to inform you that next week, commencing Sunday the 8th inst., is set apart in this and other lands by Young Men's Christian Associations, and those interested in them, for special prayer to God for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon young men. Let me most cordially invite you to the meetings as given below. You may receive good and be made useful to others.

I am sincerely yours,

R. R. MCBURNEY, Sec'y.

Then follows an enumeration of the hours of meeting, four opportunities on Sunday, and two on each of the secular days till Saturday night. A part of the time of every other session on the week days, and three of the four sessions on Sunday, is allotted to the intercessions of young men only; the other meetings are open to all classes, old men it may be presumed, mothers and sisters of tempted or unbelieving youths, good people who have at heart the moral and spiritual welfare of the young in large cities especially. It is unnecessary to suppose that this arrangement is made in other than a devout spirit, with honest intentions, and sincere faith in the efficacy of the method, and the complete adaption of the means to the end. To charge the managers with crafty designs for establishing their hold on young men, and dragooning them into the service of Orthodoxy, would be as gratuitous as it would be unfair. There is evidence, more than enough to convince any reasonable man, that belief in the Holy Spirit, in its regenerating offices on the soul, and in the power of prayer to obtain its divine assistance, is still vital in the Christian community. Thousands of preachers assert it every Sunday. Theologians defend it, divines avow it. To doubt it is vulgarly held to be equivalent to atheism. The superstition in regard to prayer is too deeply seated in the evangelical—shall we say mind?—to allow any doubt in regard to the genuineness of this concerted movement.

But it should be remembered in connection with it, and remembered as a sign of promise, that the Young Men's Christian Associations do not trust to prayer alone for securing the welfare of the class they are instituted to benefit. They neglect no means of lifting the young men up towards the region of divine resource, but in many ways make effort to answer their own prayers. Their grand building in New York is furnished with an excellent gymnasium where young men, without regard to theological connections, can, on very easy terms, put their bodies in condition to receive that portion of the Holy Spirit that comes through health and vigor. A well-furnished reading-room enables them to put their minds in communication with the intellectual world. Classes of various kinds afford instruction in special branches of culture and accomplishment. The fine lecture-room is in constant use for discourses on literary, historical, and scientific subjects, and the restrictions are no severer than the absolute conditions of an Evangelical society render imperative. The nutriment supplied there is of a robust kind. The exclusion of Mr. Weiss two years ago must not be taken as an indication of a reprehensible narrowness, for Mr. Weiss was well known to be a representative and aggressive radical whose weapon is always unsheathed. Men of opinions as liberal as his have in my hearing given there lectures more damaging to Orthodoxy, and have gone unrebuked.

But the Association has a more efficient way than any of these of bringing the power of the Holy Spirit upon young men; and that way is practical kindness. It sets agencies at work to find employment, procure respectable lodgings, guard against deception, rescue from temptation, redress wrongs, provide companionship, and give youths from the country a home feeling in strange places. By these attentions hearts are touched and won. A single week of this kind of sympathy does more than the week of prayer to make the Holy Ghost operative. It is the best sort of praying, and meets with the best sort of answer. If the answer comes in the form of church allegiance, it is fairly earned, whether sought for or not. If it comes in the form of manliness and nobleness of character, let us believe that it is accepted gratefully as a response from the highest source. O. B. F.

MISS WHITNEY'S STATUE OF SAMUEL ADAMS.

I had the great pleasure lately of seeing this noble statue, which has been lately cast in plaster, and is soon to be sent to Italy to be put in marble. It is finally destined to fill one of the niches in the Capitol at Washington.

Miss Whitney is very fortunate in her subject, for Samuel Adams was one of those typical men who seem to embody a whole era in their personality. She has treated her work in this truly ideal spirit, while making use of all the materials which biography and portraiture afforded her to preserve the individual traits of the historic man. He is also a representative hero of the early days of the Revolution. He is vigorous, manly, in earnest, able and willing to fight if need be, bold and independent in his attitude, upright in his bearing, yet genial, and sweet, and healthy, and with a slight touch of the old English gentleman in his manner, which reminds you of the "genteel culture and engaging demeanor" which historians attribute to him. It is a refreshing presence, and one sees in him the true American man, in whose hands one would like to put the destinies of the Republic. "I should like to send that man to Congress," was my involuntary thought. It seemed as if he would sweep away the falsity and corruption of the times as the north wind drives away miasma.

The execution of the statue is in keeping with its conception. It is broad, simple, and massive, no finical elaboration of details, but no want of characteristic lines. The quaint continental costume, in its formal masses, does not sit ungracefully upon the robust frame. With no eccentric effort after originality, it is genuine and natural, and has a fresh flavor of American nationality about it.

It is a work of which Miss Whitney's friends, her sex, and her country, have reason to be proud, and is a worthy result of her years of devoted and earnest study. E. D. C.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—All literary London is astir at the approach of a second posthumous work of the late John Stuart Mill on Religion: Nature, the Utility of Religion, and Theism. In anticipation of it the daily papers have published copious extracts from the work, an expedient wisely adopted as an advertisement.

Mill has, without a doubt, fully earned the vast amount of attention which his utterances receive. In all those regions within the domain of his almost fabulous reading and study he is unquestionably a master; he speaks with authority, and not as the mere scribes. Nothing, however, shows the intensity of the reverence in which he is held so much as the fact that, when he undertakes to speak on a subject which he confesses that he knows nothing about experimentally, his worshippers are just as eager to hear what he has to say as they are to listen to his profoundest knowledge and most carefully grounded conclusions.

There are thousands of persons, Orthodox or semi-Orthodox in their belief, who literally swear by Mill on every social and political question; and so, when his Autobiography appeared, these people sustained a violent shock on discovering the total absence of religious faith or experience in one who had so long been their intellectual idol.

And now this large portion of the Christian world, to say nothing of the crowd of unbelievers and materialists and positivists outside, are waiting with bated breath to hear what he has to say about religion who, by his own confession, never knew what it was to have a religious feeling or think a religious thought. If this were mere interest or a high kind of curiosity, one would not wonder at it; but I believe the case to be very different.

As Mill has been a sort of divine oracle to these people, and to differ from him seemed a kind of presumption which struck them dumb with indignation, so they look forward to his voices from the grave as if they were so many fresh divine utterances to be as implicitly accepted as all his other wise sayings while on earth. They feel as if they must take Mr. Mill's view of everything in heaven and earth, and that all their religious convictions must be moulded or broken so as to fit in with his, all their hopes and fears pruned, or even rooted up, at his bidding.

Possibly anticipating this state of mind towards himself, he has been, I think, most merciful to this flock of admirers. He has touched on the subjects of religion and Christ with consummate skill and tenderness, for which his warm, sympathizing heart may well receive gratitude and renewed reverence.

When I have read the whole book I shall be better able to speak of its probable effects; but from the extracts given in the papers there can be little doubt that two results will assuredly follow.

It will be claimed by atheists as a harmful because so temperate an advocate of atheism. On the other hand, he will be claimed by vast numbers of Christians, Orthodox and Unitarian alike, as a bulwark of Christianity, inasmuch as he exalts the character and genius of Christ quite as much as one might expect from Canon Liddon, the Rev. Charles Spurgeon, and the Rev. James Martineau, and others, of whom these three eminent men are respectively types.

Perhaps some fire-brand bigots may want to treat Mill's departed spirit as Jesus is said to have treated the knowing devils who would persist in blurting out that he was the Messiah; and they may wish to clap their hands on his mouth and suffer not his profane lips to speak their Master's praise; but the majority of the religious world will be prepared to condone all Mill's atheism for the sake of what he has written about their Christ. What a fuss there will be, what shaking of fans and waving of handkerchiefs over this wonderful "testimony" to the truth of Christianity.

Atheism is indeed content to leave mankind in the idolatry of an historical personage whom it will allow in poetry to deify, so long as they will not travel beyond the confines of physical facts, or trouble themselves with speculation about the "unseen powers."

We have here a fresh instance of the radical affinity between atheism and Christian gush. It would surprise you, perhaps, to learn how many millions of Christians have no other God but Christ, and boast that he alone is the true revealer and representation of God. Well, all these are divided by a mere disguise of words from atheism pure and simple, and it only wanted more imaginative genius than Auguste Comte possessed to make the transition complete—at all events as regards the Roman Catholic Church. Mill's definition of religion agrees entirely with his confession that he knew nothing about it but from observation and hearsay.

Much that he says is marvellously wise under the circumstances, and it is no disrespect to him to say that in the very nature of things he could not but expect to fail in his analysis. Those who take him for their god and bible must not complain if on religious questions he has said little or nothing to relieve their perplexity.

I am, sir, very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE, Dulwich, S. E., October 24, 1874.

IN A recent address on "The Moral Argument for Prohibition," Rev. Mr. Swan, of Boston, took this extreme ground: "The question arose who was responsible for the misery, the pauperism, the insanity induced by the use of strong drink? The drunkard was not blameless, but less so was the seller, the distiller, and the farmer who sold his grain and fruit to be converted into intoxicating beverage." It is this confusion of moral distinctions, by which the crime of drunkenness is laid to the charge of somebody else than the one who is guilty of it, that constitutes the injustice of the prohibitory principle.

THE PRINCIPLES OF SCIENCE: A Treatise on Logic and Scientific Method. By W. Stanley Jevons, M.A., F.R.S. New York: MacMillan & Co. 1874.

Professor Jevons has nobly attempted the writing of a modern Novum Organum, in which the latest advances in scientific thought and inquiry are clearly set forth and amply and aptly illustrated.

The work begins with the laws of thought,—logic, induction, and deduction; and, passing to mathematics, we are given interesting chapters on the properties of number and the laws of combination, permutation, and probability.

The integration of logic and mathematics is then effected at considerable and perhaps excessive length; logical statements are abbreviated by an algebraic stenography; and the climax is the construction of a logical machine, which indicates consequences when keys corresponding to the terms of a proposition are depressed.

Methods of measuring phenomena are next treated of, with considerations of the method of means and law of error.

The second volume treats of concrete investigation, observation, experiment, approximation, hypothesis, and character of the experimentalist.

The concluding chapters are on generalization, analogy, and classification, with reflections on the limits and results of scientific method. The author's plan is well connected, his style clear and generally concise, and the work abounds in most suggestive original reflections in many different departments of science.

The curious results in concrete science of laws originally mathematical are of great interest. Thus fifteen things are capable of more than a trillion permutations; if ternary alloys of thirty metals were made, each metal varying one per cent., the number of alloys would be 11,445,060, showing that an extended analysis of the properties of metallic alloys, however valuable it might be, is practically impossible.

The bearing of the doctrine of permutations on evolution has suggested itself to your reviewer; for, as the number of permutations is multiplied by the total number of factors at the addition of each new one, we seem to have the law of increasing heterogeneity, and an explanation of the gaps in Nature; for, in an important view of the whole case, a mind with twenty faculties is capable of twenty times the variety of thought belonging to another mind with nineteen faculties.

Thus differences grow ever greater with the highest forms of organization, and in some measure we can account for the gulfs of separation between man and ape, and the greatest intellects, as Shakspeare and Newton, and those next below them.

The law of probability is extended by our author beyond the hypotheses and theories of science to its very fundamental principles, because a finite experience cannot absolutely formulate the laws of an infinite universe. The phrase "uniformity of Nature" is considered unwarranted. Although many great laws, as the conservation of energy, gravitation, and evolution, are probably true in an extremely high degree, they are not believed to be infinitely so. No line, however, is drawn between the absolute and the probable.

The methods of digesting isolated facts into connected principles are finely stated and illustrated.

Thus Oersted noticed that an electric current in a fixed wire caused motion in a magnetic needle; Faraday, reversing the principle, obtained a current in a wire from the motion of a magnet, and the science of electro-magnetism was born.

The principle of continuity is traced throughout Nature; all the forms of matter investigated are magnetic positively or negatively; all conduct heat and electricity more or less; the salts of silver are only intense instances of a general impressibility of matter by light; all transparent bodies polarize light; and in short every form of matter is in some degree susceptible to every form of force.

The classification and generalization of knowledge is shown to be greatly assisted by the doctrine of evolution, whereby facts and things are arranged in genetic order, according to their complexity and mutual relations.

The ingenuity of investigators, pressed with apparently insurmountable difficulties, exhibit the value of true genius, which, avoiding an infinite number of wrong paths, chooses the single right one.

Brewster, having to ascertain the refractive indices of a great number of transparent substances, was temporarily baffled by the great difficulty of reducing his small, irregular specimens to the prism form, for the measurement of refraction in the ordinary way. He adopted the expedient of immersing the specimens in a liquid mixed until its refractive index coincided with that of the mineral, which became evident by the latter ceasing to reflect or refract light and becoming almost invisible.

Plateaw withdrew substances from the influence of omnipresent gravity by suspending them in liquids of exactly the same specific gravity. Thus a quantity of oil, suspended in a mixture of alcohol and water, on rotation becomes spheroidal and successively separates into rings and spherules: furnishing, by a very fair analogy, support to the nebular hypothesis.

Foucault, by his measurements of the velocity of light through a space of a few yards, caused the reconstruction of the tables of astronomical distances.

The conclusion of this great work touches on the conflict between science and religion; the author is a theist, and believes that, if the existence of a God may not be provable, it is certainly not disprovable; he seems to think that the theistic idea rests on grounds in human nature too refined and complex for the successful treatment, as yet, of science.

He would have science keep to the proximate and probable, rather than attempt excursions into regions of immense difficulty, while valuable work asks to be done at our doors. Within the present limits of the more exact sciences, uncertainty and doubt abound; questions come thicker than answers. And how can minds, unable to discover the directions of four unequal bodies approaching each other by simple gravity, expect to solve the problems of cosmical origin and destiny? X.

Messrs. D. Appleton & Co., the New York publishers, have recently established a New England branch of their establishment at No. 22 Hawley Street, in the charge of Mr. Thomas Bazin, who has the experienced assistance of Messrs. Hayes and Henshaw, the last-named gentleman having been identified with the business of the Appletons for eighteen years. The entire list of the firm's publications is represented on the shelves, especial pains being taken in the educational and scientific departments, which will be kept fully stocked. The location is convenient of access, the facilities for the prompt filling of orders complete, and the apartments attractively cheerful to the patron or casual visitor.—Boston Transcript.

THE EXAMPLE OF TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

RUSHFORD, Minn, Nov. 5, 1874.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

The printing of my late letter, under the caption "Duty of Total Abstinence," and your reply (the lofty moral dignity of which is in no degree obscured from me by our differences of perception) perhaps ought to content me; and, so far as you yourself are concerned, I am "silenced." Those who worship the same supreme idea and are loyal to the same master ought not to waste much time in controversy respecting the forms of worship or method of serving; and so long as you urge the good of man (appealing to faith in "self-government by reason and conscience," and loyalty to an ideal principle), and not any "lurch toward self-indulgence," as your reason for occasional use of beverages that may intoxicate, I am bound to stand by and as cheerfully as possible see you use them; notwithstanding my own private opinion ("insight"?) that all witnesses who are sufficiently advanced to appreciate and comprehend your aim could well dispense with such object-lessons, while the great multitude of onlooking children will surely misinterpret the teaching, with a damage to themselves exactly proportionate to the character, and consequent authority, of the teacher,—notwithstanding, also, my private belief that no man "knows that he does not personally need to abstain teetotally," and my clear perception that nearly all drunkenness must have its origin in over-confidence in this direction. At the same time, my love for your public warrants me in further pointing out what I conceive to be your danger, in this matter; namely, that of adopting a negative principle—"Total abstinence not a universal duty"—as a basis of positive action; or selecting an indefinite and forever scientifically indefinable, if not altogether false, positive principle—moderate drinking ("temperance")—for exemplification before people (the only ones needing "example") who are not your equals in intellectual judgment or moral strength, and who, with the common sense of common people, will always confound what you are with what you do. If you think, as Mr. Stevens broadly hints in his article "Selfhood not Selfishness," that such are hardly worth sacrificing oneself for, even "inappreciably," as you would be required to do in this case, you may wait long before finding the parties for whose benefit your "individuality" will "bound with elastic feet toward immolation," and thus go through life cheated of "one of the highest rights which I" (you) "as an individual possess." Your position on the temperance question seems to me to be perfectly represented in the following picture:—

I stand upon an eminence, surrounded by my fellow-men. On one side spread away fair, level plains, safe for the unaspiring many; while near at hand are "delectable mountains" reaching into heaven, for the few who have heard, or may hear, the divine command, "Excelsior!" On the other side is a declivity, which grows ever steeper as it descends toward a precipice that overlooks the "pit of destruction." My mission and highest aim and purpose are the calling of men to the mountain-tops. But it is fine coasting down yonder for "such as are capable of self-control," though dangerous enough for the average man. I think I know that I may safely indulge in the sport, which, if not positively invigorating, is at least not a sin per se. Confidence in one's muscle I consider a sine qua non of successful mountaineering. Rather than give a lesson of self-distrust to my fellow-man, I go coasting occasionally for a short distance; modestly suggesting at the same time that "such as are conscious of having less muscle than I have are under an imperative duty not to follow," and, with truly Hibernian wisdom, counselling all who conceitedly will follow, "Frinds, whin yiz arrive at the place where yiz can't sthop, hould up immediately!"

If this is a "dangerous metaphor" and does you injustice, you will at least know that it is not used with malicious intent; and seeing how you appear to one who loves your character sincerely may lend you some charity for those who, seeing your attitude with like vision, yet having not that love, attack you "with vituperation."

I am, sadly but none the less truly, your friend,

T. H. EVERTS.

P. S.—When that most radical and incomparably most successful of reformers, Jesus of Nazareth, was asked to cast himself down from a pinnacle, just to show folks the power of God ("reason and conscience") within him in preserving him from harm, he wisely refused; urging the principle that we ought not to "tempt" the Divine energy, i.e., put it to unnecessary proof. This man, who probably possessed as much power of "self-control" as any of us dare lay claim to, also did not disdain to pray—"Lead us not into temptation."

"But Jesus was a wine-bibber," say you? Well, I do not quote him as authority in all things, but hold up his teaching in these things for acceptance or rejection by our own love and wisdom, upon their intrinsic merit. T. H. E.

[It is matter for regret that our individual position as to total abstinence, which is of no more importance than that of any other individual, should have been made unduly prominent by our unwillingness to evade a direct interrogation in the first place. Dr. Everts will permit us, no doubt, to sink the personal and return to the general question.

That it is a very delicate and perplexing problem to decide how far regard for example should influence men with reference to the use of intoxicating beverages, must be in candor admitted. He who, purely from a tender concern for the welfare of others, sacrifices something of his personal liberty, and for their sake totally abstains from what he believes to be wholly innocuous in his own case, must command the respect of all right-minded persons so far as his motives are concerned. But the abstract wisdom or moral indispensableness of his course may still be a fair subject of doubt. There are unquestionably times when it would be cruelty to others to accept even a glass of wine: e. g. when in actual company with a reformed drunkard, who might be thus influenced to take the fatal step of reviving his own slumbering passion for drink. Further, so great is the danger and so unspeakably awful are the evils of intemperance, that every one ought to be scrupulous to the last degree about offering to others anything that may tempt them to form a habit that may ruin them. In fact, the habit of using alcoholic beverages regularly is safe for nobody, and can never be contracted without great peril. Far be it from us to encourage any man in that which may wreck him and those most dear to him. But these considerations are not the only ones to be entertained. There is danger also in the example of total abstinence. Asceticism repels most young people; their blood is high; their thirst for excitement is something that it is folly to seek to preach down. A father who teaches his sons that it is sin to taste a drop of wine may create a reactionary effect, quite contrary to that he seeks to produce; as is too often the case. The strict prohibition of cards at home has made many a gambler, whereas the wise regulation of their use in the family circle would have taken off the edge of that irrepressible curiosity which leads to dangerous experiments. So the example of a father which sanctions the cautious and only occasional use of wine by his own children is sometimes, to our own personal knowledge, the most powerful of temperance lectures. The argument is by no means all on one side. If the power of self-control is undeveloped in any one, he is never safe anywhere, despite all examples, but is the slave of his surroundings, which he cannot control. We deprecate the teaching which relies on example, instead of cultivating the original, free, conscientious individuality of the young. Radicalism warns men not to be imitators, but to obey the sacred law written in their own humanity. Why flinch from practising what we preach? For one life that is wrecked by the example of a man who governs himself by our principle in this matter, many lives will be invigorated, cheered, inspired to greater character. We hold that there is truer tenderness for others in the long run, and on the average, in the man who walks unswervingly by his own sense of right, conceding nothing to false demands upon him, than in him who benevolently but weakly studies to adapt himself to the needs of those who really care little or nothing for his example. The fact is, this popular doctrine of example seems to us to be greatly faulty: it exaggerates the importance of self, fosters a species of conceit which deludes us into thinking we are "the observed of all observers," and persuades us that we are giving tone and color to lives upon which we really exert an infinitesimal influence. It would thoroughly astonish us, for one, to discover that any man had been made either temperate or intemperate by our example. The power of PRINCIPLE—that is our text; and we do our little best to help our brother men by sticking to our principles through thick and thin. Whatever influence belongs to us will be brought to bear in no way so potent as that. Our friend's "dangerous metaphor" is a pleasant parody of our position, but nothing more. It remains true, we believe, that the example of him who is highly and conscientiously temperate in all things tells everywhere and always for temperance alone. If not, there is no end to abjuration of innocent things that may be perilously abused. Make your own life-aim identical with the purest, truest, noblest you can conceive; and then, live it out.—ED.]

LEGISLATION FOR THE NEGROES.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Mr. Hallowell recommends to me the perusal of the old files of the Nation. Always an admirer of Mr. Godkin's trenchant manner of dealing with sentimentalists, I should not hesitate, perhaps, as a subscriber, to look over my old copies but for the fact that, should I go back no further than 1865 and 1866, it would necessitate the reading of some of my own communications upon the subject at issue; namely, the justice, expediency, and feasibility of attempting to improve the condition of the negroes by legislation to be forced upon the whites of the South against their own better understanding of what their very peculiar situation requires!

At one time, the writer occupied much the same position that Mr. Hallowell appears to occupy at present: that is to say, he was a believer in the possibility of ameliorating the condition of mankind (and the black race in particular) by legislation of a practical character based upon the idea of the brotherhood of the human family, etc. But having since passed a winter among the emancipated (but, alas! not enlightened) negroes of the British West Indies—having compared the general result attained by the peaceful emancipation of the blacks in the various English colonies with the similar event in the island of Santo Domingo, where the blacks achieved their independence by a steady antagonism to the white race, continued up to the present day,—your correspondent has arrived at a very different conclusion from that attainable by the average Bostonian, with the typical "bee in his bonnet," who evolves a theory from the shadowy depths and secluded recesses of his imagination, and warps all facts to suit his highly idealized fantasy.

It is to be presumed that the columns of THE INDEX are not open for the full discussion of this question, or the writer would beg of Mr. Hallowell to do him the honor to point out the "contradictory" statements and theories alluded to, as well as to secure the unsophisticated INDEX subscribers from the "temptation" of accepting your correspondent's "estimate of the capabilities and desires of the black race, and his representation of the condition of the South, as just."

The recent elections have—it is to be hoped—cut the Gordian knot which the Republican party have so long failed in commencing to untie; and perhaps the best answer to Mr. Hallowell is that already given by a majority of the patient and long-suffering, but now righteously indignant, voters of the nation.

Very respectfully, A. WARREN KELSEY, of St. Louis.

6th of November, 1874.

[THE INDEX is "open for the full discussion" of any subject that vitally concerns human welfare, provided the articles offered are able, in good temper, and of reasonable length. The only restrictions are those of space and general literary propriety. Discussion which continually elicits new facts or thoughts is always welcome, though merely personal replies are not generally either useful or interesting. The question treated by Mr. Kelsey and Mr. Hallowell is so important that first-hand testimony on either side is valuable to all who wish to be thoroughly informed as to their public duty.—ED.]

"PREVAILING PRAYER."

The following incidents have recently come to my knowledge: the former under my own observation; the latter was related by a gentleman of unquestioned Orthodoxy.

A lady of my acquaintance had lately buried a little child, and was in deep grief over her loss; when she was visited by a friend, whose child, about the age of her own, had been dangerously ill of the same disease, but recovered. The lady almost immediately began to speak of the power of prayer, quoting the well-known Sunday-school piece:—

"Care and prayer are not in vain;
Our little boy is well again."

"I wrestled by night and by day in prayer for my child," said she, "and, praised be the Lord, he heard and answered me."

This, of course, was somewhat harrowing for my friend to hear. She, too, had prayed fervently for the life of her babe, and had not "prevailed." At last, stung by injured feeling to reply, she said: "But I should think, Mrs. C., you would be afraid so determinedly to importune the Almighty to change his plans for your child."

"Oh no. I always ask with the proviso that, if he sees best, he will do it."

"But he will do it if he sees best, whether we ask or refrain, will he not?" returned my friend. "He always does what is best, does he not?"

"Certainly; of course he does," was the undaunted answer; "but I think our prayers may sometimes help him to decide what is best."

Yet this lady is not a simpleton nor an egotist in any other direction than the religious. And why should she be ashamed of the remark, or why should her answer excite a smile? It is the teaching of the Bible and the churches. But the chief point to be noticed here is the sickly spiritual pride, and the carelessness of another's feeling, manifested by the exulting assurance that her prayer had prevailed with Omnipotence, while her less importunate sister, not being able to make God see with her eyes what was best for him to do, was left to mourn.

The other true story runs as follows: Upon a little lake in Central New York sudden squalls sometimes descend, and occasionally endanger the small sailboats which ply upon its waters. One day a pleasure-party was in great peril, but, the wind suddenly shifting, they safely reached the shore. On the hotel piazza, two hours after, a lady was describing the event.

"Oh, I thought once we should surely drown! O Dr. R." (a reverend gentleman to whom she was speaking), "I never put up such an agonized prayer to Heaven as I did then. I prayed that the wind might change, and sure enough it did, almost that very minute."

A gentleman, not of the party, turned to her and said: "Then, madam, it was probably your prayer which wrecked the other boat." It appeared that in another part of the lake, which is partially divided by a crescent-shaped ridge, another boat was by that very change of wind driven squarely upon the rocks, and two of its party narrowly escaped drowning.

However great may be the helpfulness and comfort, to many, of a belief in special providences, it may be questioned whether it does not argue a higher spiritual attainment when men and women become so much "at one" with the Supreme Power as to believe, and feel thoroughly content in believing, that the great plan of the material universe will be worked out in order and harmony, for the best good of all, without any interference on their part.

THE NEW ORLEANS LIBERAL LEAGUE.

ALEXANDRIA, Rapides Parish, La., Oct. 24, 1874.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I noticed in your issue of October 15 that Mr. William F. Perkins, of New Orleans, says: "I refused to become a member of it (the Liberal League) because it was a secret organization, and because, for that reason, its objects were not understood by the masses; although several of the Demands of Liberalism, without regard to their name or source, had been indorsed by the press of this State irrespective of political bias."

In the first place, as the Secretary of the Liberal League of New Orleans, I would inform not only Mr. Perkins but every other liberal-minded person in New Orleans that it is not a secret organization, but on the contrary open to all, and that we would be more than pleased if every such person would at once call at F. Keller's book-store on St. Charles Street, subscribe our Articles of Agreement and By-Laws, and attend our weekly meetings.

As to his other reason for not joining; namely, because "its objects were not understood by the masses," I can only say that such want of understanding certainly is not attributable to secrecy on the part of the League, want of publication, or zeal of its members.

Mr. Perkins, therefore, does not stand excused for his non-coöperation on the grounds alleged.

J. E. WALLACE.

P. S.—Fully three-fourths of our League are Democrats, but present party issues have nothing to do with the objects of the League. J. E. W.

MORAL GOODNESS INDEPENDENT OF CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY.

To one who has been educated to believe that all ideas of morality and all sentiments of unselfish love are the exclusive products of Christian theology, there is a grand and cheering discovery in the aspiring thoughts and warm, philanthropic feelings that inspire the writings of "heretics." Many of us have been taught that all conceptions of genuine goodness, all emotions of fraternal love, have been derived from the Christian religion, and that human nature, unregenerated by this supernatural light, is destitute of the smallest germ of moral excellence, and held in absolute captivity to the malignant will of Satan. When we discover that the Christian standard given us to test the moral character of men is not sufficient to determine the intrinsic worth of all the virtues that constitute humanity, that moral goodness is a natural product developed out of the universal conditions of human life, and growing independent of the culture of any special religious teaching, we have attained a free and expanded view of the native excellence of right, and the simple yet resistless persuasiveness of that sentiment which leads us to moral rectitude in our intercourse with mankind, that makes us ashamed of our former narrow religious prejudices.

Mankind have ever been struggling to rise out of the darkness of ignorance into the light of a fuller comprehension of truth and right. Superstition has constantly sought to suppress the natural instincts of progress in man, and substitute her false and fickle phantoms for the faithful and divine light of Nature. If we could discard the stupid, arrogant creeds of our individual religions that blindly assail the expanding instincts of human nature, and study humanity in an untrammelled spirit, we should discover the elements of a nobler conscience, and develop the bonds of a stronger and holier philanthropy, than the world has yet dreamed of. Love would supplant sectarian hate, and manly respect, instead of bigoted and derogatory pity, would be felt for the honest opinions of our fellows. H. CLAY NEVILLE.

A CARD FROM MR. WILLIAMS.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I heartily regret to find my position as Trustee of the Hyde Park Public Library misstated in a communication and editorial of THE INDEX of November 5. My feeling and action have been so decided in favor of the largest liberty that I do not like to let your sentence, "the Unitarian minister" (myself) "showed himself rather supercilious than liberal," go uncorrected.

At the meeting of the Trustees reported in that communication I was not present. I have never voted to reject A. J. Davis' works, or any other works given to the library. The statute limitation is the only one I recognize, and no obscene book has yet been presented. In private conversation, on the street, I gave my opinion of the folly of one of A. J. Davis' books; but I did not intimate that such an opinion would cause me to reject the book, or any other, from the library. For this personal opinion, of a book not in the least theological, expressed in the public street, reported from hearsay, I am represented as more supercilious than liberal.

The impression of my own spirit and that of the Board of Trustees is misrepresented in that communication. No gift book has ever been opposed by any member of the board, clergyman or layman, Catholic or Protestant, on any other ground than that it had a manifest immoral tendency. A volume of A. J. Davis' works was rejected on that account, his views of divorce and free love being read at the meeting and objected to, certainly with some show of reason, though not convincingly to myself, on that ground.

Hyde Park is a place singularly free from sectarian bigotry and exclusiveness, and the Board of Trustees well represent the temper of the town. There are four ministers and three laymen on the present board; and the objections to Davis' works have come as vigorously from the laymen as from the other members. Indeed, one business man offered the resolution that "no minor be permitted to take a specified volume from the library without written permission from his parent or guardian." The Hyde Park Public Library is free, and the Trustees are free from any unmanly or, if you will receive it, unchristian narrowness. Respectfully yours,

FRANCIS C. WILLIAMS.

"ARE LIBERALS LIBERAL?"

EDITOR OF INDEX:—

In your issue of October 22 you say: "We should like nothing better than to put a copy of this paper every week into the hands of the forty-three thousand ministers of this great Yankee nation."

Which leads me to say to those of your subscribers who do not file their papers that they can do good missionary work, if after reading their INDEX they send it to some minister, or other person needing "liberty and light." This has been my practice since I first became a subscriber.

Could a liberal missionary fund be raised for the purpose of sending THE INDEX to the heathen—the fund to be used in the discretion of the editor? Are "Liberals" liberal? E. C. ALPHONSE.

[Some "Liberals" are exceedingly "liberal," as THE INDEX has good cause to acknowledge gratefully. Others do not do their share. The best possible form of "liberality" towards the paper is the giving of personal aid in extending its circulation.—ED.]

A CARD.

SPIRITUALIST CONVENTION AT NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Unknown to and unauthorized by me, my name was placed upon the list of officers elected by the body that called themselves as above, at their annual meeting of Sept. 26, 1874. I am a Spiritualist of twenty years, and am entirely opposed to the fanaticisms preached on that occasion, and very much chagrined to find myself in such company.

I do not accept the trusteeship, and request that my name be not used in the future, by them or others, without my consent.

Will all papers which have published their list of officers please copy the above, and oblige me?

MRS. LITA BARNEY SAYLES.

DAYVILLE, Conn.

GEORGE ELIOT (Mrs. Lewes), although plain, is not positively homely, as is generally represented, and her face, when animated by conversation, is said to be handsome. Her figure is good, her bearing graceful, and her manners elegant. Very shy by nature, and rendered more so by the peculiar circumstances of her marriage, she is averse to meeting strangers, and is usually very reserved and silent in company, unless it be composed of her intimates. Her friends almost worship her; and those who have met her on familiar terms invariably speak of her as charming. When freed from restraint, when the ice is melted between her and her visitors, she talks with wonderful ease and eloquence. Unlike many gifted persons, she does not monopolize the conversation, but draws others out by her sensible sympathy with and interest in them. Not a few of her admirers think that her speech is even superior to her written thought, and say that no one can fully appreciate George Eliot until he has heard her talk.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. REASONS FOR USING THE

EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

DISRAELI has been elected rector of the University of Glasgow, by a vote of 700. Mr. Emerson had 500 votes.

WE ARE glad to be informed that the report of the desecration of Thomas Paine's grave is wholly incorrect, and that we were mistaken in our recent statement to that effect. The facts are given in another column.

BISMARCK has notified the Vatican that, unless the usual forms are strictly observed in the election of a new Pope, Germany will refuse to recognize him. The death of Pius Ninth may be the signal for great disturbance in the political world.

THE ONLY sure way to secure accurate and "honest" lists for the Unitarian Year Book, in which no minister or society shall be included that is unwilling to profess "Unitarian Christianity," is to send a circular to every name on each list, putting the question plumply. Who doubts that the authorities will adopt this business-like method of purifying those tainted lists?

THE BUILDING COMMITTEE of the new Paine Hall, in this city, will please accept our thanks for a fine colored lithograph of it. This noble monument to a noble man promises to be a great ornament to Boston. It is now hoped to dedicate it on Paine's birthday, January 29, 1875; and all friends of the Investigator may well congratulate it on the prospect of inhabiting such a "home."

UNDER the stimulus of Mr. Gladstone's recent anti-papal manifesto, the Roman Catholics held a meeting in London on the eighteenth of November, at which they affirmed their civil loyalty, despite the decree of Papal infallibility. None the less is it certain that this decree strikes at the root of the civil supremacy of the State all over the world. If this meeting had any sincerity, it meant a rejection of the new dogma, and Old Catholicism may yet break out in England.

MR. CONWAY wonders why the old-school Unitarians in America should refuse to fraternize with the free religious movement, when in England the patriarchs of Unitarianism, Martineau and Vance Smith, have planted themselves on the broad ground. But Martineau, at least, is not an old-school Unitarian. The truth is that Protestantism can only propagate itself by fission, and the two tendencies in Unitarian development are coming gradually to a rupture.

THIS ARGUMENT against a local heaven is adduced by a correspondent: "God cannot be in a place called heaven. If he were, the inhabitants of opposite sides of the globe could not point their fingers towards him at the same time." The conclusion is truer than the premises. Two men on opposite sides of the globe can easily point in the same direction, one up and the other down. The difficulty would consist in determining which of the two should point up.

A DESPATCH from New York dated November 9 stated that the "society coopers" in that city lay in wait that morning for the non-society men, assaulted them, and seriously injured several. Nothing could be more unjustifiable than such conduct, which is mob-tyranny of the worst possible type, and necessarily destroys that sympathy which laboring men wish to receive from the community at large, and would receive increasingly but for outbreaks of this thoroughly bad spirit.

A MR. MCKENZIE having said in the Boston Herald that "no power on earth can help a man who is a drunkard, unless the man has become a true and earnest Christian," Mr. W. F. Jamieson replies in the same paper that there are 100,000,000 of Mahometans who are among the most temperate people on the globe; that "the drunkest nations are the Christian nations"; that "there are thousands of infidels in every land who are temperate," and so forth; and he signs his pithy letter, "Yours for more temperance and less religious cant."

SOME of the most curious investigations of modern science are explained by Professor Marey in his Animal Mechanism (just published in Appleton's "International Scientific Series") which gives the philosophy of terrestrial and aërial locomotion in animals, birds, and insects. By means of the myograph, muscular contractions can be so exactly registered as to show the disturbance of the muscle in motion; and the instrument has been made to reveal very interesting results, representing to the eye the peculiar nature of motions which are far too fine or rapid for ocular observation.

MR. JOHN FISKE, assistant librarian of Harvard College, who has recently spent some time in Europe completing his preparations, has just published through Osgood & Co., in two volumes of nearly five hundred pages each, his Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. Mr. Fiske is a follower of Herbert Spencer, though by no means a slavish one; and the considerable reputation he attained as a lecturer at the University, fairly earned by large ability and indefatigable industry, will make his work eagerly sought by all who wish to keep abreast of the times. It is understood that he enjoyed the society of Mr. Spencer while in England, and this fact will increase the curiosity of the thinking public to read the book. By and by we propose to analyze some portions of it, but must now content ourself with this bare mention.

THE FAMOUS Latin line, "Homo sum: humani nil a me alienum puto,"—which is so often misquoted and referred erroneously to others than the real author (Terence, Heauton-timorumenos, I, 1, 25), — is dwarfed to Church uses by the Catholic Review, which thus mutilates it and takes it as its standing motto: "Catholicus sum: nihil Catholicum a me alienum puto." The grand sentiment of the line is even more foully murdered than its metre and its syntax. Terence makes Chremes says, "I am a man; nothing human do I count alien to me." The Review says, "I am a Catholic; nothing Catholic do I count alien to me." Out of its own mouth does the Church of Rome thus stand condemned, in the estimation of all who can distinguish a magnificent thought from its miserable sectarian counterfeit. Could there be a more striking proof that Romanism (like all forms of Protestantism) makes a sect of its fellowship by "cutting off" a small part of the human race in an exclusive church?

A LETTER from a thoroughly trustworthy correspondent in England has this interesting information, which we are authorized to share with our readers: "Bradlaugh has staggered many of our Moderates by the number of votes he polled at Northampton. He has cut the party in half there, and given a lesson richly deserved. The result will be that at the next general election he must be adopted by the Liberal party. He is a man who deserves success on account of his genius and extraordinary courage, and would have had it long ago, were it not for the affected piety of English society, and the unfair conduct of the London daily press, which, having exhausted calumny, has now resorted to a 'conspiracy of silence.' None of the London daily papers (we have not a single Liberal daily organ) reported a line of any of his speeches at Northampton. Yet next to Gladstone and Bright, he is the most eloquent man in the country, and has more brain and power than any other working-class leader."

The Spirit of Sectarianism.

ESSAY READ BEFORE THE CONVENTION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AT PROVIDENCE, OCTOBER 30, 1874.

BY WILLIAM J. POTTER.

The subject of this paper is "The Spirit of Sectarianism." I shall try to trace this spirit to its source and somewhat in its career, but more especially to certain evil results which follow from it. Incidentally, the subject will touch also upon the kindred evils of dogmatism, bigotry, ecclesiastical arrogance and intolerance,—but only incidentally: any enlargement upon these topics will be left to the speakers who may follow me. We shall also see that, notwithstanding the evils flowing from the sectarian spirit, there is a certain value in the fact of sects, which cannot be ignored in any fair consideration of the history of religion.

To begin with the most general definition possible, we may say that the spirit of sectarianism is that condition of mind which assumes that a particular church or religious denomination has all of religious truth that is necessary for human beings, or gives the one correct interpretation of religious truth; and hence it is a spirit that is devoted with exclusive zeal to the upbuilding of some particular denomination or church. And this is a spirit which belongs to no one religion exclusively; and yet from it no one of the great religions of the world is wholly free: a fact which seems to indicate that the spirit is a general product of human nature. Yet, again, it must be said, I believe, that none of the great world-religions began with the spirit of sectarianism. That spirit is not large nor vital enough to sustain a deep and far-reaching movement, such as is necessarily involved in the origin of a religion. The great religions—whether Christianity, Judaism, Buddhism, Mohammedanism—have all begun in a spirit of religious reform, of revolution, of new light and life; in a fresh invigoration of the religious sentiment as a vital creative power, prior to and independent of creeds and ceremonies. But when I say the religious sentiment, observe that I do not mean the emotional element in religion only. I mean the whole religious faculty of human nature, in which, to my view, feeling, mental perception, and the sense of practical obligation are equal elements. And religions begin in a new and powerful invigoration of this threefold faculty in all its parts; in some new perception of truth and heightened sense of moral obligation, suffused and vitalized by a strong emotion. The doctrinal statements and ceremonies of worship belonging to a religion have come later. In other words, though the religions in relation to each other may be considered as sects in the general sense of the word, and though the sectarian spirit exists more or less in all of them, yet they originated and attained their growth and power in a new emphasis and vitality, not of that which is dividing and partial, but of that which is universal and uniting.

We shall find, doubtless, certain utterances even in the beginning of all religions that seem to oppose this view. There are in the New Testament, for instance, plenty of texts which have been used in defence of sectarian claims in Christendom, and which had their origin in a sectarian spirit,—texts in which something of the old exclusive Jewish temper remained, or in which some aggressive zeal of a new propagandism easily fell into bigotry; as in that strangely inharmonious sentence recorded in the interview of Jesus with the woman of Samaria: "Ye worship ye know not what; we know what we worship; for salvation is of the Jews;" or this: "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." Yet, in spite of such passages as these, it seems to me that an impartial reader of the New Testament must decide that the two leading and dominant characters in the historical drama of which it is a record—Jesus and Paul—were broad, liberal, inclusive, and free from sectarian bigotry in their aims; and that Christianity in its origin, whatever it may have become since, was, in reference to the age when it appeared and especially in reference to Judaism, a grand movement in behalf of the freedom, progress, and elevation of the religious sentiment—a declaration of the emancipation of religion from the thraldom of written covenants and instituted forms, and an attempt to reconnect it directly with universal springs of thought and life. The prevailing spirit of Jesus seems to have been well expressed in the parable of the Good Samaritan, in which, in opposition to the priest and Levite of Orthodox Judaism, he makes the despised and heretical citizen of Samaria the moral hero who has attracted the world's admiration. This, too, from the early records of Christianity, shows the catholicity of its primitive spirit: "I perceive that God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is accepted with him." Mohammedanism, of all religions perhaps, has relied most on human reason, and appealed most strongly to the practical understanding. Yet Mohammedanism in its origin was catholic in matters of opinion. Said Mohammed, "Try to excel in good works; when ye shall return unto God, he will tell as to that in which [in opinion] ye have differed." Buddhism was equally broad and liberal. Said Buddha, or an early disciple, "Honor your own faith, and do not slander that of others." And this is more certainly from Buddha himself: "There is but one law for all, and its grace, like heaven, affords room for all."

But this high tide of fresh moral life and spiritual enthusiasm in which religions have their origin after a time naturally subsides: and then the spirit of sectarianism sets in. The wonderful tide—which was yet wholly natural—having become a historical fact, the posterity of the people whom it floated to new shores and enriched with new possessions fall to debating as to how it came, and whence it originated, and what the form and dimensions of its waves, and whether they rolled in this direction more powerfully than in that, and where was the point of highest flood; and they turn to inquiring whether it cannot be brought back,—whether some special homage to the beliefs and ceremonies it has left behind may not invite its return. Thus confounding these incidental results, these leavings, with the causal spirit from which they came, they institute over them, through the establishment of a priestly class, a special guardianship, with the hope of thereby keeping connection with their vital source.

But these resultant doctrines and ceremonies are several and different. The treasures that have been left behind are various. And different eyes will see the same thing, too, from different points of view, and put a different value upon it, according to the aspect in which it appears to them. Hence the holders of these traditional beliefs and ceremonials get into controversy on their relative merit. One thinks this the central and most prominent belief, the one which has most vital connection with the original high spiritual tide; another that; while a third is confident that both of these zealots are wrong, and that both of their vaunted central beliefs have been wrongly interpreted by their respective champions, and that nothing but an utterly different point of view will reveal the real nature of the phenomena. Still another thinks that not belief, but some ceremony, some deposit of ritual that was made, marked the high-water line of the original flow, and that this is therefore the most precious thing remaining; while another, again, says that it was not belief nor ritual, but the example of perfect personal character, that was left high above everything else, and that is the most valuable and saving possession. And each of these advocates of the special possession he most prizes is sure that it indicates the way by which the original tide is to be persuaded back, or vital communication be kept with the power that caused it. Dig down, says one, beneath this deposit of doctrine—this belief, perhaps, in an atoning sacrificial offering,—and you will surely strike a spring which connects with the source of that spiritual flood which brought us all our bounties. Another is equally confident that you must sink this well from the spot where rests the character of the memorable personage connected with that high tide of life, or no healing waters will flow. See, says another, this beautiful and significant ceremony ensconced at the head of this inlet; you must dig out from that to connect with the great ocean whence the tide will come.

And thus it is that the spirit of sectarianism begins and progresses in the midst of a religion. It is an attempt of the human mind, after the conditions of newly vitalized religious sentiment in which religions originate have passed, to restore these conditions—or at least to keep connection with them,—by a logical apprehension of them, and by the institution of certain exercises in spiritual mechanics, which it is thought may somehow establish a magnetic current to them that will at some day become vital. It is the effort of the understanding to preserve and keep alive the traditions of a historical epoch the productive forces of which the human understanding alone never set in motion, and never can therefore really vitalize. All parties holding the traditions still agree as to the importance of preserving them; but, at this stage in the history of a religion, they will inevitably fall apart as to the best means of preserving them and saving their authority. And so sects form, according as this problem of means is settled in one way or another.

The first exhibition of this sectarian spirit in Christianity that left any very serious results was the bitter Arian and Athanasian controversy, when the dividing question was whether the nature of Jesus was of the same substance with God or only of similar substance. Though previous to this, even as early as the first part of the second century, there had been a vigorous dispute between the Eastern and Western churches as to whether the rite of the "Lord's Supper" should be administered on the fourteenth or fifteenth of the month,—that is, on the day commemorating the crucifixion of Jesus or the day previous, which was the day of the Jewish Passover; those who argued for the latter maintaining that, as Jesus had taken the place in sacrifice of the Paschal lamb of the Jews, so the rite of communion which celebrated his sacrifice ought to be on the same day as the old Jewish rite it had displaced. These seem to us, probably, small questions, and we can hardly conceive that controversy upon them could have become so bitter,—in the latter case almost breaking the churches asunder, and in the former leading to prolonged and bloody persecution. The churches, it is true, did not formally separate at this time, but these strifes with regard to a doctrine and a ceremony, as to which of two views would best preserve the traditions and authority of the Christian religion, doubtless paved the way for that separation which did occur, though not finally consummated till the eleventh century, between the Roman and the Greek Churches. Small questions, indeed, on which to hang such great results! Yet there are Christian sects to-day which are kept apart, and in positions of hostile attitude to each other, on questions quite as small. Whether baptism shall be by sprinkling or immersion, whether "regenerate" is a proper word in a baptismal service for infants, whether "santification" precedes "justification" or vice versa,—these, certainly, are not very large questions (many of us here probably do not know what these latter theological words mean), yet they represent the most essential points of difference in sectarian controversies of quite modern date. The great Episcopal Church has just been discussing the proper kind of vestments and the permissible amount and character of genuflection for its clergymen. Small questions indeed! But when the sectarian spirit once begins, it is impossible to confine it to large questions or to matters in which there is really an important principle of faith involved. The understanding delves in details; and when a religion has reached, in its historic career, that point where its existence and authority have to be defended by the logical understanding—that point where, its original self-moving energy having departed, its defenders are trying to recall it by systems of doctrine and ritual,—details will be magnified according to the point of view from which they are seen, and small differences as to method and machinery will be regarded as involving momentous consequences. And if the vital religion be there, back in the past epoch, in the traditions, in the book, in the memorable person—the vital religion which the present age must secure,—then it is a question of the utmost importance just what is our point of view, and what is exactly the right method of reaching the treasure; and the smallest variation from the true stand-point for taking an observation, or from the true method for establishing a connection, may vitiate and nullify the whole procedure.

But while the spirit of sectarianism is to be condemned when brought to the measure of an absolute standard of worth, yet historically it is to be credited with a certain value. At least, the existence of sects is not the worst evil that can befall religion. Better, certainly, the jarring, conflicting, and even quarreling sects of Protestantism than the mental stagnation and uniformity in respect to opinion which are the result of that ecclesiastical repression of all intellectual inquiry on religious topics which is practised in the Church of Rome. The fact of Christendom breaking into sects represents a certain intellectual activity in religious history, which has been a most useful element.

It is quite customary to attach value to sects for another reason; namely, that they represent different phases and aspects of belief, all standing for some portion of truth, and all suited to certain natural varieties of religious temperament and condition. And in this plea, looking at things as we actually find them in the religious world, there may be some truth. But it is a specious argument, and apt to be pushed too far. It confounds effect with cause. People as a general rule do not choose their religious faith by their natural temperament and habit of mind. I mean the mass of people do not. But it is chosen for them by their birth, education, and surroundings. It is the faith of their family, of their nation, of their race; and hence theirs. National or ethnic temperament may have had something to do with modelling the faith, but individual disposition in a single generation very little. On the contrary, the faith has had more to do with shaping and coloring the individual temperament and habit of mind. It may be true that a certain mental temper will take naturally to Calvinism, and that people of a certain grade of culture adapt themselves most readily to Roman Catholicism. But it is quite as true that such a system as Calvinism helps to produce the mental temper that is said to be adapted to it, and that the Catholic policy aims to keep people on that grade of culture which will make them docile and obedient subjects of the Papal Church. I readily grant that all the sects and all the religions may be accomplishing some good; that a bad religion may be better, possibly, than none; but it does not therefore follow that people are by nature and temperament so adapted to a bad religion that they would not be bettered by a better one. I might agree, for instance, that it is better for the Roman Catholics in this country to keep the religion which they have, and faithfully observe it, than for the same people to have no religion. But I do not therefore believe that this form of religion and no other is adapted to their condition and temperament, and that none other could impress them with its power. They have, in fact, never had the opportunity to choose any other, and never will have the opportunity so long as the Catholic Church can hold them within the limits of its chains. And to say that they are fitted by nature for no other kind of faith is to say in effect that they are fitted by nature for ignorance, superstition, mental darkness,—in short for remaining in a state of intellectual childhood; for that is the theory of the Roman Church in respect to the mental condition of its members. The priest is father; the pope the infallible father, highest of all; the layman is the submissive child. Dare we say that this is a form of faith which is the natural, normal destiny of any human being who has come to man's estate? So in respect to other sects of Christendom. Let us beware of the easy-going opinion which would give them an indefinite lease of life and full liberty to keep their present beliefs unchanged, on the ground that they all meet somebody's needs and are doing some good. The question should be, Are they doing all the good they might do and the highest good? And though they do meet the needs of people of certain conditions of temper and culture, are they educating the people into better conditions, so that their needs shall be advancing continually to a higher plane? To supply a demand may be useful, but to create a more intelligent demand is a much higher service. And there are some religious needs—the needs of the thoroughly Calvinistic temperament, for instance; of that gloomy nature which sees only in man a ruin, in earth a vale of tears, in religion a cross to be borne day and night with solemn face and funereal gait—there are imaginary religious needs like these which ought never to be supplied, but be left to starve to death; or, better, be driven out of the mind, and their places filled with more healthy and cheerful occupants.

And this brings me back again to what I intimated to be the real value of religious sects, so far as they have a value, and of the spirit that has produced them. They serve to keep up a certain healthy mental agitation on religious topics, and furnish a certain stimulus to free inquiry, even when they do not directly encourage it. There can be no doubt that in Protestant Christendom the principle of the right of private judgment, the very glory of Protestantism, has been the great agency in the production of the numerous sects into which Protestant Christianity is divided; and looking at the more important of these sects, the historical order in which they have appeared represents very accurately the advance of the religious sentiment to some higher truth and larger liberty. There has been a general progress in religious ideas, corresponding to the successive breaking off of sect from sect and the formation of new denominational organizations. Independents, Quakers, Methodists, Congregationalists, Baptists, Free-will Baptists, Universalists, Unitarians,—they have all contributed something of value to the general Protestant progress, and mark successive steps in the career of organized Christianity towards fuller light and freedom. Thus much must be allowed to the value of sects in religious history: they mark by their formation the line of advance, and they serve to some extent to stimulate a healthful competition in mental inquiry.

But then it is to be observed that it is not the sectarian spirit that has produced the sects, but rather the Protestant spirit of free inquiry. The sectarian spirit holds them apart after they are formed, but does not form them. And while the sects, as being the product of the principle of the right of private judgement, have a certain worth, of the sectarian spirit, which sustains the sects after they are organized and keeps them in hostile attitude to each other, but little good can be said. So far from acting in conjunction with the spirit of free inquiry and independent judgment, it becomes their enemy. Not what is true and right, but what accords with the creed and policy of the sect, and is supposed to be necessary to its maintenance and aggrandizement—this is the standard of the sectarian spirit; and this is always an evil and corrupting standard of action. Coleridge well said, "He that loves Christianity better than truth will soon love his own sect or party better than Christianity, and will end by loving himself better than all."

And this indicates what is really the first and most central evil of sectarianism. It is that some system or method or special revelation of truth is made the end instead of truth itself. The sects dispute as to the proper doctrine, or form, or ecclesiastical polity; but they all agree that the doctrine or form or polity, whatever it be, is designed to establish and keep connection with a past epoch of spiritual life, in order that from its reservoirs the spiritual wants of to-day may be supplied. All this debate and strife about dogma and ceremony must cease, therefore, when people shall come to see that, though that past epoch is connected by the natural relations of historical sequence to the present time, it is a purely unfounded assumption that the present spiritual life of the world is dependent upon it. The great question with the Christian sects is how they shall contrive to reach that spiritual spring, and convey its abundant waters to thirsting lips to-day; and over the answer to that question they debate and contend with bitter speech and temper, striving to undermine and thwart each other's projects, and each to turn the other's work to its own advantage. But let them be taught that, though that spring was most abundant for its time, and though the rare mental and spiritual conditions of the age produced an unwonted tide of spiritual life, yet those conditions cannot be restored nor that spring reopened; and that there is no need they should be, because the resources of Almighty Power, not then exhausted, are as fresh to-day as they ever were, and deliver themselves under new conditions to supply the wants of every generation of men,—let the sects learn this, and the fuel that mainly feeds their sectarian logic and strife would be taken from them. Show the world that religion does not depend on establishing a conduit by theological engineering back to Judea, to the well where Jesus sat, but that every man, and woman, and child to-day, in the spot where they are, stand in the midst of the living forces of Deity, and by the natural laws of physical and mental life may come into vital relations with those forces,—show mankind that beneath the common soil on which the commonest man's feet are now planted are springs which are connected with divine reservoirs, and which, if he but sink there his well, will send up the waters that are for everlasting life,—show mankind how vital religion depends not on the preservation of a past record, nor memory of a past epoch, but on the establishing of healthy relations with present forces of divinity, and they will soon find something nobler to live for than theological dispute, and sectarian competition, and ecclesiastical conflict.

And from this central, primary evil of the sectarian spirit there follow certain subordinate evils which must be briefly mentioned. First, there is waste of mental and moral energy. How much of intellectual power and resource, of scholarship and investigation, of moral earnestness and strength the sects now draw to themselves, and use up in their struggles to support their sectarian objects, and in their conflicts with each other! Were all this mental and moral ability, even through the sects, put to the service of the highest truth and righteousness, then no complaint could be made. But it is retained in the interest of certain dogmas and ceremonies which the sectarian spirit will not allow to be questioned, and spent to a large extent in maintaining the claims of sect against sect, which claims in the end mutually nullify themselves,—so that the power which is spent in defending them is largely wasted. Thus, much of the best and highest energy of men, the purest consecration, the deepest earnestness is drained off to sectarian uses, and the higher interests of truth, justice, and humanity are left to suffer for the want of this vitalizing support.

Then there is also financial waste. If we could reckon up the amount of money which the sects spend, not in proposing and advocating any new and different ends of religion, but in defending themselves against each other's attacks in respect to different methods for reaching the same end, the figures would startle us. Think of the vast sums of money that are put into churches, and into religious missions, and into other organized machinery of Christianity. Much of it, we will admit, goes to good purposes. I do not say that the churches had better not be. Allow that it is better that this money should be spent as it is spent than that it should not be spent for any purpose that is religious or moral or educational. But think also how much of it is spent for simply sectarian ends, for building up sect against sect, and dogma against dogma; and how much of it might be emancipated for the higher uses of humanity if the sects were only liberated from the sectarian spirit. Suppose, for instance, that the several churches of a city, instead of being organized against each other on the basis of sectarian dogma, were organized on the simple, natural principle of seeking truth and doing good. Dividing the territory of the city among them amicably, what might they not accomplish, by organized and harmonious effort, in behalf of a higher culture, in behalf of the poor, the ignorant, the criminal, the suffering, and of every cause of humanity!

Again, the sectarian spirit stands in the way of a broad and true education,—stands therefore as an obstacle in the way of truth. The school or college that is maintained by a sect and in the interest of a sect may yet do something for the cause of education; but it is hampered and fettered in its processes, and the education that is obtained there is education narrowed by bigotry and shaped by sectarian purposes. It is one-sided and stunted. There is no largeness, breadth, nor freedom to it. Its end is sect, while the end of true education is truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. And at the present day nothing needs to be more watched and guarded against in this country than sectarian tampering with the interests of education. The sects, not only the Roman Catholics but others, have a way, especially in New York, of seeking and obtaining large appropriations of public money for their sectarian schools. It is a habit that should be forbidden by constitutional law, not only on the ground of equal justice, since it taxes people for the support of a religious faith in which they do not believe, but also in behalf of the interests of education itself. A system of culture that does not include the breadth of all knowledge; that skips certain pages of history, and reads others through a glass of religious prejudice and bigotry, darkly; that blindfolds the student to the facts of science, to the discoveries and progress of reason, to the magnificent prospects of future knowledge, and opens his eyes only as he turns his face to certain designated regions of the past, is a misnomer,—a libel on the name of education. Such a system tampers with the spirit of truth, and tends to destroy the quality of intellectual integrity. It makes truth subservient to certain dogmatic and ecclesiastical assumptions; and hence by it culture is shorn of its crowning glory, which is the incitement of the love of truth and the enamored pursuit of it for its own sake.

And, to name a final evil, this debasement of the sense of intellectual integrity easily glides into damage to the moral nature. The sectarian spirit is the creator of the maxim that the end justifies the means. The sectarian beliefs and objects being assumed to be true, anything for sect becomes the motto. And so the sectarian man comes to have a sectarian conscience. He fellowships only those who are of the household of his own faith. His sympathies, affections, benevolent impulses are bounded by the walls of his own church. He may be naturally humane, kind; but his humanity is warped and checked by his sectarian partisanship. He becomes zealous for a fellow-churchman instead of zealous for a fellow-man. He loves his church, and not mankind; will defend dogmas, though he suffer human rights to be destroyed. This kind of character is happily passing away. But I think we have all seen such persons, and may still find them without difficulty,—those in whom zeal for sect seems to have eaten up or repressed the finer humanities of their natures. It is a matter of recent history how persistently the sectarianism of the churches stood in the way of the antislavery reform. The Church, in fact, has never led in any social reform that has the good of universal humanity at heart. The sects are too busy with paying tithes of mint, and anise, and cummin to take upon them the good Samaritan's service. This narrow-heartedness of sectarianism shows itself in small things as in great. I even know of a man, a zealous Methodist and a good carpenter, who has no shavings in his carpenter's shop for a Unitarian household. Thus it is that social and personal antagonism, and even malice, easily follows sectarian bigotry. It comes oftener true than we are apt to think, as Coleridge said, that he who begins by loving his sect better than truth will end in moral selfishness.

But it is said there will always be sects in the world; and it is said in a kind of despairing tone, as if it were useless to aim at anything else. Men will always differ in religious opinion, it is said, and this difference of opinion must express itself in different ecclesiastical organization. Yes, there will always be sects and the spirit of sectarianism, until people shall come to see that character is higher than creed, and a holy life better than a holy ceremony; and until it shall be learned that religious organization can safely rest on the natural aspiration of the human heart after truth and virtue. Be it ours to help society forward to this blessed consummation; to the day when the highest creed shall be faith, not merely in truth discovered, but in the pursuit of truth, and the highest object of a church shall be to promote the love of truth as the finest possible adoration of God, and the practice of truth as the best possible service to man.

[For THE INDEX.]

A NEW METHOD OF TEACHING FRENCH.

I shall name it the talking system. I shall call it French yeast of a very superior quality, that never fails to set the atoms of the dullest brain and the slowest tongue in motion, when once introduced.

Prof. Saureur, who is the author of this remarkable school, starts with the supposition that persons unlearned in the French language are as truly children in that department of knowledge as the infant is ignorant of its mother's vocabulary. One is as helpless as the other, as dependent as the other; and both must be led into the great mystery of speech by like methods. The mother talks to the little one by means of the love in her eyes, by the smile on her lips, by kisses and caresses, and by every conceivable gesture, till it begins to comprehend her spoken words and lisp them after her. She brings no other means to aid her in this task of speech-making. In a similar way, with no other methods than the mother takes with her into the nursery—armed with no grammars, or dictionaries, or other outward means of proceeding,—Prof. Saureur appears before a class of educated English men and women to give them their first lesson in French. They are not familiar with a word of his language, and he is nearly as ignorant of theirs. Each is boxed up in a separate world.

Before I attempt to show the process by which these two tongues are to mingle and run together, and their speakers to become familiar as people of a common country, I must mention the very significant fact that, in this school, everything depends upon the teacher. "As is the teacher so is the school," is an old saying, and answers very well for school-keeping; but it is not emphasized enough by half for this method, which must be conducted by a specially-gifted instructor, or there can be no school at all, either good or bad. Prof. Saureur is an accomplished conversationist; but that is not all. He is a man of letters, possessing wit, genius, culture, and vast information, which beam all over his face, and speak in every motion. This exterior man is so promising he awakens the curiosity of the class at once, and inspires them with intense eagerness to gain access to the rich jewels contained in his intellectual store-house. They forget the rough and rugged labor that intervenes, and grasp with eagerness any tools he may put into their hands, with which to make their way.

This class may be composed of children, but it is more likely to be of matured men and women; graduates from Harvard, students from Yale, and persons who have spent years searching for the hidden treasures of the heart and intellect. Teacher and pupils are both familiar with the truths and beauties of Plato and Socrates, only their ideas are draped in different costumes,—one wears French clothes, the other English. They come together for the first time. The teacher prefers, perhaps, to speak about Tyndall's last address, which contains the "promise and potency of terrestrial life." The class, quite likely, are thinking in the same direction. They too would choose to discourse upon this theme. It would not be surprising if the teacher should articulate some thought from Tyndall. Neither would it be astonishing if the class before him surmised what he said, though they comprehended not a spoken word. But they read the soul that moves over the face, beams in the eye, lights the brow, and lifts the hand. Already a means of communication has been opened by signs and gestures. These are to prepare the way for words,—they are to do the talking before words are learned, and are to be an accompaniment for words through all future conversation. Were Mr. Tyndall present, the teacher would point to him, and say, "un homme sage." This would be in keeping with the philosophy of his system, which is to express the supreme thoughts in the mind at the moment. But Tyndall is absent; so the teacher holds up one finger, and says, "un doigt," — two French words are learned. He holds up two fingers, and says, "deux doigts," — three French words are learned. The parts of the finger are examined; the different fingers,—"l'index," "le pouce." They are counted, and a great deal of conversation is carried on concerning them, which lasts an hour.

The second and third lessons continue with the hand, the arm, shoulder, the hair, and objects that are visible about the room. In all this time not a word of English has been spoken; but a great variety of gestures has been employed, and every word learned has been a powerful magnet gathering to itself innumerable companions.

For a few lessons, these persons with ideas are treated much like children with none. They are so helpless that only such subjects can be treated as can be illustrated. But in the fourth lesson we observe in the professor's new grammar, Causeries avec mes Elèves, such sentences as the following: "Connaissez vous Socrate?" "Est-il vivant ou mort?" "Daus l'Iliade d'Homère vous voyez l'impitoyable Achille lui-même respecter les cheveux blancs du vieux Priam" (the lesson has been "les cheveux"). From this time onward there is a wide divergence from the course that would have been pursued with children. The teacher begins to unlock the intellect, appeal to the thought and sympathy of his pupils. A few common words have put them more nearly on a level, and they now have the key with which to enter each the soul of the other. The interest deepens. The pupils are not only accumulating column upon column of words, but they are discoursing henceforth upon real, living subjects.

They sit about their teacher as one could imagine the pupils of Plato to have done, in the quiet groves of the Academy. Are they learning French, studying the Fables of La Fontaine, the writings of Montaigne, or the radicalism of Wendell Phillips? It would be difficult to tell. One moment they are talking of the future tense, or the use of the subjunctive; the next we hear: "Quel livre de M. Emerson préférez-vous?" or, "Quelle est la pièce de Shakspeare que vous avez le plus lue?" or, "Pouvons-nous mesurer la grandeur morale de Socrate, mesdames?"

Who would not struggle bravely to gain the means whereby to converse upon such lofty themes with a profound scholar, a graceful and sympathetic conversationist? Who would not take French lessons, if for no other purpose than to study the literature of the world, to be filled with new thoughts and inspiration, and to be fitting oneself as a genial companion.

There has not been a word of English heard in all these lessons, neither have there been any French translations made in English.

The class read from French books; and, when a sentence or paragraph is met that is not understood, the teacher makes the explanation in French, in the same way that he treats any subject of conversation. Thus they learn to think and feel in French,—the whole mind becomes saturated with French, and the ideas are clothed in French terms. So great is the gift of this remarkable teacher, and so superior his system of instruction, that before he parts with his pupils he has given them, not only the technical words of his language, but taken them into the heart of the French literature, into the character of his countrymen, and into the soul of French life. They find they have duplicated themselves, or added a French nature to their American. They are two times one; and they scarcely know which one they are the more.

The inquiry naturally arises, Can this new method be made to benefit the masses as well as individuals? Can there be more than one Saureur, and can his system be introduced into general education, English as well as French? That there is need of this, no one will deny who visits our school-rooms, and listens to the dull and monotonous "lesson-saying" that is dragging its weary self along day after day, as regularly as the weaver's shuttle, and just about as intelligently,—who realizes the fact that not one teacher in fifty is able to command the attention of a class for any length of time by means of any real conversation,—who goes into society and witnesses the miserable botch-work that is made when people attempt to hold what they call a conversation.

We are introducing many new arts into our education. If there be room for one more, "the talking art," its success would be sure under the guiding hand of such a master as Prof. Saureur. Ought not the "talking art" to precede all others?

L. S. H.

THE PROVIDENCE Press relates this anecdote: A young gamin applied at the Central Station this morning for a ticket to the poor children's excursion of the Christian Association. He was asked if he was a Christian, and promptly said he was. "Are you an honest boy?" "Yes, sir!" The phrenologist of the force lifted the lad's hat to examine his bump of conscientiousness, when out fell a ticket for the excursion.

MODERN MARTYRDOM AGAIN.

THE INDEX says:—

"In these days the question is coming home to more than one young Unitarian minister in the depths of his own heart: 'Can I let myself be classed publicly among Christian ministers, without tarnishing my own ideal of absolute truthfulness and honor? On the one hand are popularity and competency; on the other hand are exclusion and pecuniary distress; and it is simply the public acceptance or rejection of a name which is to decide between the two alternatives.' This is the invisible coercion brought to bear to-day on many a conscience in the Unitarian ranks by the now irrevocably and honestly accepted policy of the denomination. For those who are made to feel it we have only the deepest and tenderest sympathy; no advice, certainly no misjudgement. Each soul must fight such battles as these alone. Martyrdom of the modern sort has no glory in it at all; but it has many a sting, and operates as ever to make heroes here and hypocrites there, though perhaps the heroism and hypocrisy are unknown even to themselves."

We do not like to be indifferent to any phase of human suffering; yet we find it impossible for us to bestow pity upon those real or imaginary young ministers whose heart-rending trials are so touchingly described. It is no new thing for the Unitarian denomination to be a Christian body. It has been so not only "in these days," but from the very beginning. Its ministers have been ordained and settled as Christian ministers. If they are still disciples and followers of Jesus, there is no reason why they should not continue to stand at their posts without a single misgiving on the score of truthfulness or honor. If they have ceased to be disciples and followers of Jesus, and can no longer receive pure Christianity, they should make known their precise position, and bravely take the far from terrible temporal consequences. There is nothing in the situation to make a manly man whimper, or to excite the painful sympathy of any of his friends. The same great law of duty applies to Christians, Jews, Mohammedans, and Free Religionists: if you are in a true position, stand fast; if you are sailing under false colors, the sooner you hoist your true flag the better. The inward satisfaction which attends a sincere course is so great, that outward gains or losses scarcely deserve mention.

It is very easy to exaggerate the penalties of heterodoxy in "these days." There have been dark ages when heresy cost a man a great deal, alienating him from his friends, exposing him to the loss of all his property, and putting his life in danger. Thanks to modern toleration, one can be as heretical as he pleases now with almost entire impunity. The public still despise hypocrites, but for honest convictions, however uncommon, only heartiest respect is entertained. A noble character is always honored. Although it is an open secret that Abraham Lincoln and Charles Sumner were freethinkers in religion, the fact never cost either of them a vote, and their eulogies have not been stinted on this account, excepting by a few obscure journals which gained no credit by such narrowness. The "rekindled fires of Smithfield" are only painted flames.

Its foreign readers, who know little of the state of public opinion in America, may infer from the plaintive statement of THE INDEX, "on the one hand are popularity and competency; on the other hand are exclusion and pecuniary distress," that ultra radicals have recently had distressing experiences in this country. Perhaps distant sympathizers will even weep over the persecutions and privations to which our arch-heretics have been subjected. They may imagine Mr. Potter impoverished by his non-Christian position, and Mr. Frothingham hungry, threadbare, and deserted because of his "advanced" opinions. Yet the truth is that Mr. Potter's salary has been enlarged, and Mr. Frothingham's popularity and influence have increased almost in exact proportion to his departure from generally accepted doctrines. Theodore Parker was often very brave, yet he sometimes wasted a good deal of pity upon himself, for his heresies paid large dividends of profit and success. He was no poor martyr, denied the means of foreign travel, obliged to content himself with a few books, and preaching in an out of the way attic to a handful of hunted followers. No minister on this continent had a more enviable lot. He spoke to admiring thousands in Music Hall, and his printed sermons circulated throughout the land. Few public institutions can boast of a larger or costlier library than he owned and enjoyed. He gave sharper invectives than he received. And Mr. Emerson, surely, is not a candidate for anybody's compassion. He is not shunned and abhorred, besides being refused a share in the oversight of institutions of learning. No mob has ever broken the windows of his house, or burned him in effigy. Even Judge Hoar, President of the Unitarian National Conference, and therefore, perhaps, most likely to be full of sectarian animosity, has never harmed a hair of Mr. Emerson's head, although the facilities for at least a verbal assault are always at hand. On the contrary, Mr. Emerson is probably the most revered and best beloved citizen of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, finding in the pastor of the Old South Church the sturdiest opponent of his doctrines, and yet the heartiest admirer of his personal character. If he had scars or wounds they would doubtless be concealed; but it is a notorious fact that he has none to show. In loving his fellow-men of every creed he is only reciprocating their cordial affection.

The secrets of Free Religious confessionals have not been imparted to us. There may possibly be some Unitarian ministers who have ceased to be Christians, but adroitly conceal this fact from their congregations, because they are too timid or too dishonest to speak the truth, and they underrate the popular appreciation of sincerity. Instead of regarding such men with "the deepest and tenderest sympathy," however, we think they are clearly to be blamed. They lack the courage to share the fate of their real convictions. They should not lose a day, nor an hour, before defining their new positions. This is the only course which can preserve their self-respect, or command the respect of their fellow-men. THE INDEX says it has "no advice" to give such persons; but the Register's counsel is freely offered: If you claim to be men, don't let the mild terrors of modern persecution coerce you into the least treason or hypocrisy. It costs too little now to be a dissenter for any but arrant cowards to feign conformity. If the early followers of Jesus were not dismayed by the cry of "Christians to the lions," non-Christians and Anti-Christians should easily muster fortitude enough to endure the light afflictions of martyrdom "in these days."—Christian Register, Nov. 14.

GOSPEL AND BIBLE NOT AGAINST WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

I do not understand why THE INDEX affirms that the Gospel and the Bible are against woman's rights—even her right of suffrage. The Gospel is the good news by Jesus Christ. He gave the substance of it when he cried out, in words taken from Isaiah, "The spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord."

The Gospel, therefore, is not an "enemy," as affirmed by THE INDEX, to any right, or any human good, but, on the contrary, is a proclamation of deliverance from disabilities, of liberty from every form of enslavement, of freedom from every yoke by which any soul may be "bruised," and so an eternal protest against the invasion of rights and the infliction of every kind of unjust subjugation.

Surely, this is broad enough to cover the claim of woman to personal, social, and political equality with man, since, if she be cast down in either, she is bound and bruised by a cruel and oppressive hand.

And how is the Bible against woman? This proclamation of deliverance for the suffering and the wronged is not only from the Bible, but sounds its key-note, and is the genius of the book. Its drift, its reforming and elevating spirit, its culminating force, is an ally of God in the human soul in his ceaseless working to lift the race (of both sexes) to the plane of essential equality in the perfect unity, where, in the words of that same Bible, "there is neither male nor female, for all are one."

I am well aware that the Jewish idea and usage, as well as certain texts of the epistles, may be made to do service for the "subjection of woman;" but these are incidental, and are of no account in determining the character and tendency of the Book as a whole, which, as I have said, in its spirit and sweep, "is mighty, through God, for the pulling down of strongholds," and for elevating the lowly, the outraged, and the oppressed. Sectarianism, theological dogmatism, hierarchical despotism, are quite another affair, as they are quite other than the Gospel or Bible spiritual force. Let THE INDEX battle those with its heaviest artillery; but it will find small support, even from progressive religionists, in a crusade against the Gospel of Jesus Christ and the Book of Books.

THE BIBLE AGAINST WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

BY ANNIE BESANT.

[In a lecture in London, published by Trübner & Co.]

The last argument which is to crush us is the authority of the Bible. Frederick Maurice warned people of the danger they ran when they "turned the bread of life into stones to cast at their enemies." Now, passing by the fact that many of us do not consider the Bible as the bread of life in any sense, I would suggest that using it as a pebble to sling at the forehead of Liberty has not, in the past, tended to exalt it, nor is it likely to be more successful in the future. Long ago, a king sat on a beach to warn back the advancing tide. Wave after wave broke into laughter on the strand, and the water rose higher and higher, till it washed the kingly feet, and began to surround the kingly chair. The sea knew no master. And so for centuries has religion stood, with the Bible in her lifted hand; she has warned back each wave of the rising tide of liberty, and each wave has rippled forward regardless of her threats. "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers," said the Bible to Cromwell; and Cromwell, though he took off his hat to the Bible, struck down the tyrant who strove to enchain the people. "Honor the king," said the Bible to Washington; and Washington defied the king, and founded the American Republic. "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," said the Bible; and stern law saved the feeble from the Bible sharpened sword. If a city is withdrawn to serve strange gods, "thou shalt surely smite the inhabitants of that city with the edge of the sword, destroying it utterly," said the Bible to Alva; and Alva obediently harried the Netherlands, and the people rose, and fought for their lives, and won. "Cursed is Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren," said the Bible from ten thousand pulpits; but men arose, and swore that, Bible or no Bible, the slave should go free. The Bible! why, it has bolstered up every injustice—it has bulwarked every tyranny—it has defended every wrong. With toil and pain and bloodshed have the soldiers of Liberty wrung from the reluctant hands of priests and Bible-worshippers every charter of our freedom, every triumph of our cause. Every step in science has been won in despite of the Bible; every inch of natural knowledge has been conquered at the sword's point from the realm of the supernatural. From the stake where Bruno stood and died, from the dungeon where Galileo knelt and trembled, a voice has rung out that every advance of science has been struggled against by the Bible and the Church. But take heart, you who cling to your Bibles; as soon as we have gained this one step forward, as soon as it rings through England that women are no longer in subjection, you will be able to claim as the offspring of your Christianity that which, at its birth, you anathematized. Each trophy of advancement, each symbol of triumph, is claimed by the bibliolator as his as soon as it becomes popular. You will be able to find in your Bibles a sanction for the free development of womanhood, even as you have found room in the six days of Genesis for the vast æons of geology, and space in the petty firmament of Moses for the mighty facts of astronomy. The Bible is claimed as the true parent of modern freedom, as the striker-off of the chains of the slave, the guardian of the feeble from the tyranny of the strong. It is the spirit of Christianity that has done it all, you say; when the letter said "kill," it meant "preserve;" when the letter said "obey," it meant "resist;" when the letter said "enslave," it meant "set free." So take courage, ye worshippers of a book; your idol will be shattered once more, but it can once more be re-mended; it will fall once more before the trumpet-blast of Freedom, but once more it can be raised. We mean to set woman free; free to follow the guiding hand of Nature; free to fulfil every fair capability of her being; free to develop every noble intellectual power, and every passionate longing of her heart; free to expand in every direction; free to grow, to strengthen, and to rise. Little care we whether or not our work square with the rules of an old Eastern civilization; let those who are anxious about it see to that. Our work need not in itself trench on religion; but if Religion and the Bible grapple with us, and try to stop and destroy us, then Religion and the Bible must either stand aside or else they must go down.

NOTE.—In the debate which followed this lecture, exception was taken by some of the speakers to the introduction of the religious question, and it was suggested that in attacking the Bible I had thrown down an apple of discord. I would point out that the raising of this question was not of my doing. Had the speakers known a little more of the subject, they would have been aware that the authority of the Bible is constantly brought forward as an argument against women's rights, and had I avoided meeting this argument I should have left out a link in my chain. The Bible has so great an influence in this country that its dictum to the contrary is sufficient to destroy, in most minds, the most logical arguments. Had I wished to impeach the Bible as a whole, I should have made a very different attack upon it; but, in this lecture, nothing more was needed than to state forcibly that, so far as it touched on the subject, the Bible must be set aside; and a few historical parallels were added, for the comfort of both friends and foes. The advocates of women's rights have not the least desire to mix up the religious question with the political agitation; but if our opponents fling the Bible at our heads, are we forbidden to turn it aside by lifting against it the shield of free thought?

THE SECRET OF OUR SUCCESS.

Whatever may be assigned as the reason for the success of the Democratic ticket in this State, the real cause can be found in the following three propositions, namely:—

1. After temporizing and coquetting with the negro element, and going so far even, by some of our over-zealous but indiscreet and impolitic citizens, as to favor a unification of the races, the white people, finding that all of their advances had been neglected and treated with scorn by the negroes, finally resolved to assert their manhood, their power, and their dignity.

In the Convention at Baton Rouge they asserted both their might and their right, and proclaimed themselves independent of all negro support. The issue was proclaimed to be one of the white man against the negro, and no concern was manifested at all as to the alliances which the negro might make.

The position thus assumed attracted the attention of the negro, and immediately set him at work thinking over his own fate and his own interests.

2. As a natural sequence of this position, and in order to strengthen it by all extraneous means, the propriety of dismissing from employment all political enemies promptly suggested itself to those who were determined to make the political enemy feel the weight and power of the Southern white element.

3. The heroic and gallant conduct of the citizen-soldiery of this city in their brilliant and successful overthrow of the usurpation of the government of Louisiana convinced the world of the rectitude of our purpose and the justice of our cause. Besides, it satisfied the negroes of the utter weakness of their patron Governor and his contemptible gang of followers.

It proved to them that a government that could be swept out of existence in fifteen minutes, with all of its paraphernalia of military strength and national support, was not worthy of either respect or confidence. This was the signal for desertion. And hence we find those who once worshipped at the shrine of Republicanism deserting the temple and religion of their faith, fleeing from its falling fortunes, and singing pæans of praise to the rising star in the political firmament.

The firmness and resolution of the white people to make this political contest upon a race issue has given us the glorious victory over which we now rejoice. It astounded and terrified the negro, and it forced him into a recognition of the superiority and the irresistible power of the white man. Acknowledging their inferiority, and recognizing the strength, superior intelligence and education of the white people, the negro was appalled by the significant combination of the whites against negroes and radicals.

They saw in it something which boded no good to the party with which they had been allied, and they felt that it meant disaster to their own interests. Once satisfied of this fact, and convinced of the weakness of the party and leaders with whom they had been allied—seeing them dissipate like snow before the sun, when the white people rose in their might against the constituted leaders, who fled like whipped curs before an avenging people,—it was not difficult to bring over to the side of the powerful and conquering party the support of the demoralized and defeated adherents of a fallen and vanquished party.

The secret of our success, therefore, in this political campaign, is attributable entirely to the bold, fearless, and independent course of the white people, who made the negro understand that "this government was made by white men, for the benefit of white men and their posterity forever, and should be administered by white men, and by none other whatsoever."—New Orleans Bulletin of November 5.

THE SABBATH QUESTION.

Rev. John Chambers having invited the Philadelphia Radical Club, and especially its President, to hear him discuss the Sabbath question on Sunday next, Mr. E. M. Davis, President of that body, has declined the reverend gentleman's invitation in the following letter:—

OFFICE OF THE RADICAL CLUB,
333 Walnut St., Philadelphia, Nov. 12, 1874.

TO THE REV. JOHN CHAMBERS:—

I thank you for your kind invitation to the "Radical Club, and especially to its President," to hear you on "Sunday" afternoon next on the Sabbath question.

Do not overlook this fact: We do not deny the holiness of the day you call the Sabbath. Our idea is "not one, but seven days holy." We believe that what is wrong to do on the first day of the week is wrong to do any day; that the thing done, and not the time when it is done, is the matter to consider. We would not have people religious one-seventh of the time only, but all the time. We do not wish to narrow or contract goodness to one day, but have the world honest and true every day.

I regret that I cannot be present. One serious objection to going to hear our position controverted is that we should have no chance to reply before the same audience; and, as I have no church pulpit from which to announce this, I take the liberty of doing so through the pulpit of the people—the newspaper.

It is so well known that at our Club all sides have an equal chance of a hearing that it seems superfluous to say that we shall be glad to see and hear you at our rooms at any time. Very respectfully,

E. M. DAVIS, President Radical Club.

A CURIOUS NOTE, which comes from Russia, is of a visit which Humboldt once paid to Iszym, in Siberia. Carrying a letter of introduction from the Governor-General, he went to the house of the chief government functionary of the place, M. Skotin, who was apparently a sort of Goodman Dull of immense self-importance and ignorance. The first thing that the Governor-General heard of the savant was in a long letter from the wise Skotin:—

"Some days ago," he said, "there came here a German named Gumbolt, a dried-up little man, looking anything but respectable. As, however, he brought with him a letter from your Excellency, in which I am directed to treat him with politeness and consideration, I received him with all due respect. At the same time, I must observe that this individual seems to me very suspicious, and even dangerous. From the first he did not please me; he gossipped too much, and did not like the fare I offered him, though I have a cook, Ferlisa, who makes excellent pirogs, and would be most happy to offer some to your Excellency. . . . He seemed to despise both myself and my hospitality, and he evidently looked down upon the most eminent officials of the town. On the other hand, he is continually talking with the Poles, and other political criminals under my charge. Your Excellency will forgive my boldness in saying this, but these conversations with political criminals could not escape my observation, especially as a few days since, after a long conference, he went out with them at night to the top of a hill which commands the town. There they took out of a case which they had brought with them an instrument in the shape of a long tube, which seemed to me and my colleagues like a huge cannon. This they placed on a three-legged stand, and then aimed it straight at the town. Each of them approached the instrument, apparently to adjust it so as to rectify the aim. Seeing the great danger which threatened the inhabitants of the town, which is built entirely of wood, I immediately ordered the town guard, which consists of a sub-officer and six men, to march to the spot with loaded muskets, and not lose sight of this German's proceedings. If the man's treacherous designs prove what I suspect them to be, we are ready to risk our lives for the Czar and for Holy Russia."—N. Y. Tribune.

REV. DR. SUNDERLAND, the chaplain of the Senate, prayed that God would make "this Congress as the Sanhedrim to the Jew," but the telegraph reported it as the "Sacred Ram to the Jew."

LECTURE NOTICE.

Mr. Rowland Connor has recently prepared a course of lectures upon the temperance question, of special applicability to the present time, and aiming to give to this difficult subject a new treatment, and also a more thorough discussion than is possible in a single lecture. The special topics are:—

1. National Drinks.
2. Beer, Wine, and Liquor.
3. Stimulants and Narcotics.
4. The Laws of Intemperance.
5. Temperance and Legislation.
6. Radical Remedies for Intemperance.

Mr. Connor has also prepared a course of scientific lectures as follows:—

1. The Genesis and Methods of Science.
2. The Antiquity of Man.
3. The Origin of Species.
4. The Descent of Man.
5. The Origin of Life.
6. Illustrations of Evolution.

The third and fourth of these lectures contain a full outline exposition of the theory of Mr. Darwin, and may be given apart from the others, if desired.

Address, ROWLAND CONNOR,
Jamaica Plain, Mass.

PRISON PUNISHMENTS.

John F. Augustus, Miss Linda Gilbert of New York, and David Sargent will speak upon prisons, prison scenes, and prison instruments of punishment at Harmony Hall, 18 1-2 Boylston St., Monday evening, Nov. 30, at 7 1-2 o'clock. The identical whipping-post formerly in use at Virginia Penitentiary, with ball and chains, shackles, gagging irons, etc., will be exhibited, and correct representations of "the solitary" and lower arch now in use in Massachusetts State Prison, the iron cage, shower bath, pillory, bishop's mitre, yoke, Boston gallows, boy's pony, treadmill, etc., etc. These implements of torture are in use in this, the nineteenth, century, and are considered necessary to reform men and women, and fit them for a better life; as to hope, position, or any restoration in this life, it is taken for granted to be entirely out of the question.

Mr. Black will be present with his celebrated stereopticon. Tickets 25 cents.

Poetry.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

IN VAIN.

No more repeat the former days,
Applying rules, devising ways
To lace souls straight in moral stays:

Ye gild the outward cheat and show.
The times grow ripe, and wise men know
Beneath is hid the world's old woe.

Crimes lurk in fastnesses secure
Of mind and heart long left impure.
How do we thus our peace insure?

The millions, fearing, praise their Lord,
And, down the lines his signal heard,
Force moves to ply the hated word.

Armed rule of saints! The State's bad cheat.
Crimes sally forth and now retreat,
Plotting for aye the Law's defeat.

O jealous gods of outward might,
Whose sceptred hands conduct the fight
Of holy pride from Sinai's height!

Your arms now wither of old age.
Your powers depart. Your whitening rage
Would pile with death the whole world's stage.

What can ye win with all your strife,
Your vengeance whetting still the knife?
No sweet and fructifying life.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

N. B.—Postage on THE INDEX is five cents per quarter, dating from receipt of the first number, payable in advance at the place of delivery.

The Index.

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY
BY THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,
AT
NO. 1 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON.
Toledo Office: No. 35 Monroe Street. Julius T. Frey, Agent and Clerk.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

N. B.—No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

Francis Ellingwood Abbot, ... Editor.
Abram Walter Stevens, ... Associate Editor.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 26, 1874.

SUNDAY LECTURES.—The Editors of THE INDEX will lecture occasionally on Sundays, if desired, within a convenient distance of Boston.

MR. POTTER'S comprehensive analysis of "Sectarianism," which was listened to with such interest at Providence and is now kindly contributed to these pages, occupies the first place in our present issue, and will be read with even greater interest.

"OBEY GOD and his Apostle, if ye are true believers," says the Koran. "Obey God and his Christ," says Christianity. "Obey God and his Lawgiver," says Judaism. All claim obedience for a man, as the interpreter of God. And all compel the free spirit to refuse their claim.

THE INDEX will be sent to any name not now on our mail-list until January 1, 1876, on receipt of $3.00 in advance. Here is a chance to receive the paper for thirteen months at the price of twelve months. Please tell your friends and neighbors of this liberal offer, and help us to increase our circulation.

WE COMMEND to all who are interested in the Southern problem an article copied elsewhere from the New Orleans Bulletin, on the causes and meaning of the late election in Louisiana. If it tells the truth, the White Leaguers will undoubtedly learn in due time that discontent with the corruptions of Republican leaders does not mean betrayal of the negroes to their late masters. They will be wise not to construe it in that manner.

ON THE evening of November 17, we had the pleasure of meeting a little gathering of forty or fifty persons interested in radical thought at a hospitable mansion in Lowell, assembled on the invitation of a lady whose zeal, enterprise, and courage in the good cause show how much can be accomplished by private exertion. A series of meetings was initiated by her last winter, at which Messrs. Stevens, Gannett, Longfellow, and others, read essays with great acceptance; and we had the honor of beginning a similar series for the present season. It is safe to conclude that everywhere such gatherings might be held, for nothing could have been less auspicious than the prospect in this case. Let others take courage from the great success of this experiment, which proves that the new thought will find hearers even in old centres of Orthodoxy.

PROFESSOR NEWMAN shows in another column how utterly foreign to his purpose it was, and is, to misrepresent THE INDEX; but it pains us that he should consider the editors of the paper as constituting it. We do not feel at liberty to omit that passage of his letter, which we should gladly do. Without the contributors, both editorial and occasional, to its columns, THE INDEX could never have commanded the respect which their ability and character have won for it. However our English friend may exaggerate the part contributed by the editors, our American readers will correct this disproportionate estimate, and do justice to the mental and moral force constantly displayed by our unselfish co-laborers. The paper would most certainly have been a failure without them, and no one could more gratefully appreciate the worth, nay, the absolute necessity, of their assistance than we do. It is a movement, not a person or persons, that THE INDEX represents; and we must thank Professor Newman himself for showing how little we alone are qualified to represent all its aspects.

"MODERN MARTYRDOM AGAIN."

It is not often that THE INDEX is supposed to err in the direction of too much "sympathy"—though it has in fact quite as much as is consistent with uncompromising adhesion to ideas. But now it finds itself rebuked by the Christian Register because it has expressed the "deepest and tenderest sympathy" for sorely tempted men—for young clergymen whose opening eyes begin to see that Christianity is not the supreme truth they have hitherto considered it, and yet that to take a public stand outside of it may involve their dependent families in immediate and distressing poverty. Even if such men fail to be heroes, and sadly shrink into the mere outward conformity which is no new thing in the history of the Church, our sympathy is not lessened, but increased to pity; for who are we to exact heroism of other men? The Register thus "freely offers" its advice: "If you claim to be men, don't let the mild terrors of modern persecution coerce you into the least treason or hypocrisy. It costs too little now to be a dissenter for any but arrant cowards to feign conformity." The advice to be true to truth, no matter what the cost, is certainly faithful counsel; it expresses the ideal of every noble heart. But when men have been true to truth, and learned what such fidelity may cost even in these days of Neo-Christian looseness and feeble bigotry, there is nothing admirable in the spirit which scoffs at their prosaic yet none the less painful sacrifices. It is altogether too much like the philanthropy which settles down comfortably in an easy-chair, and thinks that "the weather is moderated" for the fireless poor, when a new scuttle-full of coal has been emptied into the blazing grate that it toasts its own shins by. We have just as little admiration as the Register for the conformity which is the price of a soul; but when we remember that the motive of it is sometimes love for a delicate wife or tenderness for helpless children, we confess that indignation against the conformer turns into a sterner feeling towards the ecclesiastical system that tempts him to his fall. All the more honor to those who, even under such pressure, know how to stand erect and unbent!

The paragraph of which the Register makes light was prompted solely by very recent occurrences. A passage in a letter received within the present month, from which we suppress everything that might betray the authorship, may be quoted in evidence: "Instead of giving me some notice, I was dismissed at once, after I had told them what I really believed, my salary being discontinued immediately and my little family left without resources at the beginning of a hard winter. . . . I was made to understand by —— that, if I would suppress, all would be well; and I was counselled to practise policy. —— —— speaks of my playing the rôle of a martyr. How easy it is for people who have never made any sacrifices for their convictions, who really have none apart from pride and sentimentality, to talk of playing the rôle of a martyr! If these people knew that what they call playing means often, in such instances, the want of the necessaries of life, even hunger and anxiety for those dependent upon you for their daily food, amounting almost at times to desperation, as has been the case for a good part of the time with me for the last —— years, they would choose perhaps some other word." No, they would probably not. It is not truth that dictates their choice of words so much as regard for ecclesiastical interests; which truth seldom furthers.

The defence which the Register sets up for its contempt of "modern martyrdom" like the above rests on this statement: "Its [the Unitarian denomination's] ministers have been ordained and settled as Christian ministers. If they are still disciples and followers of Jesus, there is no reason why they should not continue to stand at their posts without a single misgiving on the score of truthfulness or honor. If they have ceased to be disciples and followers of Jesus, and can no longer receive pure Christianity, they should make known their precise position, and bravely take the far from terrible temporal consequences."

This does not tell the whole story. The Unitarian denomination have not only professed "pure Christianity" from the beginning, but also perfect liberty, unlimited free inquiry, as their whole literature shows. It makes the same profession to-day. It thus induces young men to enter its ministry on the supposition that pure Christianity and perfect liberty are entirely compatible, as that denomination administers its affairs. What turns out to be the fact? A young minister, obeying his own earnest cravings for truth, comes to the conclusion that the Christian name implies something that is untrue, and therefore he resigns it publicly. At once he is dismissed from his pulpit, and turned adrift without ceremony to care for himself and his family as best he may. Has he no cause of complaint? We can easily imagine him saying to the denomination:—

"You enticed me into your service under false pretences. You told me, through Channing and all your most revered writers, that 'Christianity is a life, not a creed,' and that it permits unquestioned, absolute freedom of inquiry, and (by implication) absolute freedom to proclaim in public the results of that free inquiry. I now find that your Christianity is not a life alone, but insists upon the 'livery of the Lord,' and requires at least a verbal profession of allegiance to him. Exercising with a faithful conscience the free inquiry which was guaranteed to me, I now find myself dismissed from your service because I have, as you bade me, told you the highest religious truth I could see. I now find that your Christianity and your liberty are not compatible, and that your liberty must go to the wall. I therefore charge you with deception in assuring me that they are compatible; I charge you with seducing me into your service under the pledge of a freedom which you have withheld; I charge you with having led me to waste precious years of my life in the preparation for a ministry of faithful truth-seeking and honest truth-speaking, and now, when it is too late to acquire another profession, turning me adrift with my family to struggle with bitter poverty. I accuse you, therefore, not for being Christian, nor yet for not being free, but for telling me you were Christian and free both, when you are Christian only. If you had honestly avowed the truth, and warned me at the start in the Divinity School that you did not permit liberty to go beyond a fixed limit, I should at least have been warned in season; but you still profess to be perfectly free, and are still deceiving others as you have deceived me. When, consequently, you compel me either to be false to my own soul or else suffer great hardship in my dearest interests, you have wronged me by your insincerity, and I hold you not guiltless therefor."

We can imagine, we repeat, such an indictment as this brought by the young minister who wrote the letter quoted above, and whose exemplary life we have never heard so much as doubted. What has the Christian Register to say in answer to it?

LETTER FROM PROFESSOR NEWMAN.

WESTON SUPER MARE, Nov. 4, 1874.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

While I am grieved that (in INDEX, October 15th) you account me unjust to THE INDEX, I am truly glad at the strength of your repudiation. I supposed that I was pointing at simple fact, and never expected you to disown it. Of course I know that in THE INDEX each is answerable only for what he writes himself; but you and Mr. "A. W. S." appear to me to be substantially THE INDEX. With considerable trouble in looking back through the columns, I have no doubt I could find the passages which have misled me; but as you frankly disown my interpretation, it is better to say that I regret the generality of my statement, and would withdraw it if I were able.

Not the less I must say that in your very disavowal I find the nucleus of that at which I was pointing. You impute to Christian doctrine "the punishment of heresy as a crime." No doubt this has been practised by Christian professors for many ages, preeminently since the Crusades initiated the Christian Church into great and bloody wars for the Holy Sepulchre,—a matter as remote from the objects inculcated by Jesus and the apostles as were the monstrous cruelties and follies of the proceeding. You remember that my first indication of my difference with you turned on this point. I say, Christianity has been MANIFESTLY depraved. We know that the collected writings called the New Testament are far older than Athanasius. To know what Christianity was, to them I must refer, as all Protestants do. I know how Protestants feel under your imputations, because I have been a Protestant Christian; since you too have been one, your positions are unintelligible to me. From the age of eleven to thirty-six and upward, I was a devotee of the New Testament. So far was I from there learning that secular punishment of a heretic was a duty, that I regarded it, just as I do now, as a wicked outrage far worse than the heresy, and having not a particle of defence from Christianity. I cannot but believe that this was your sentiment, and your judgment of New Testament doctrine, when you regarded yourself as a Christian.

I signalize this point, but I think you really unjust to Christianity on other points which you quote also; especially, "the deterioration of ethics by making an inspired book the test of morality." No inspired book was preached by Jesus and the apostles. The New Testament did not then exist. Paul often quotes the Old Scriptures, but he overrode "the letter which killeth" by "the spirit that giveth life;" in the tone of the modern Quakers. To accuse Christianity of deteriorating morals appears to me alike unjust and unwise. I do not think you can mean to say that Jesus, James, Peter, Paul, and the John who wrote the epistles, deteriorated the morals of their contemporaries. You mean that the moderns—professed Christians who teach a doctrine unknown to the first teachers—deteriorate morals. Say this, and you will say nothing paradoxical, nothing that can justify resentment; moreover, you will have me on your side. In the present state of knowledge to set up the New Testament as infallible depresses ethics.

Again, as to "the circumscription of human brotherhood by sectarian lines;" I object to the objection on a different ground. It is trivial in comparison to the atrocity of murdering or persecuting heretics, and it taxes Christianity with offence, where offence rises solely out of the weakness of human nature. Just so you may assail patriotism, because so many have been led by intended patriotism into injustice to foreigners. "Our country, right or wrong!" as a toast to animate soldiers, will not have your approval, nor mine; yet I think we shall both agree that there is an important virtue, fitly called patriotism, nor ought he who preaches it to be charged with error, because others misapply it, as our Lord Nelson is said to have done, in teaching that "to hate a Frenchman as you hate the devil is the first duty of a midshipman." When Paul says, "As we have opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially to those who are of the household of faith," I see nothing to reprove, any more than if one said, . . . "unto all men, especially unto our own compatriots." Why call this drawing up sectarian circumscription? Under a frightfully and grotesquely depraved sacerdotal papacy, non-Christians were treated as without human rights; yet such was the genial power of the New Testament, working amid the rubbish which overwhelmed it, that out of Christianity has come more general philanthropy, more warmth of mercy to men of every race and religion, than ever out of the Greek and Roman schools of philosophy, much honor as they deserve. And we ourselves, who think (of course, I mean, justly think; for I have no hesitation about it) that we have outgrown Christianity, yet it is only as wise pupils ought to outgrow a wise master, when they superadd other teachings and study to his lessons. Now we have eighteen hundred years experience beyond that of Jesus, James, and Paul; hence on the one hand I see nothing to boast of, if we surpass their measure of knowledge and wisdom; on the other hand, I think it ungracious to overlook our debt to them. Until you consent to discriminate them from the sacerdotal, worldly kingdom of the papacy, you must appear to Protestants, and to me, as unjust. I am heartily yours,

F. W. NEWMAN.

CONSTITUTION

OF THE AMERICAN BOOK TRADE ASSOCIATION, ADOPTED AT THE ANNUAL CONVENTION HELD IN PUT-IN-BAY, OHIO, JULY, 1874.

Among the many exciting political, theological, and reformatory conventions of the day, this meeting of booksellers has not attracted as much attention as its importance deserves.

Every maker or buyer of books must know in how chaotic a state the business has been for some years, and how difficult it is for any one to tell whether he is paying a fair price for the article he receives or not. We have known a difference of twenty-five per cent. in the retail price of a book in two stores side by side; and at one time leading magazines could be bought singly at less than the cost of subscription.

Now individual purchasers may fancy that they get an occasional advantage from this state of things; but in reality the reading public suffers just as much from it as the Book Trade does. It is the interest of all that business shall be on a regular, well-established basis, and that those engaged in it shall have a fair profit on the cost of production, so that they shall be encouraged to undertake expensive enterprises and to give the public the best work possible at a fair price.

We need very much reformation in our whole way of doing business, so that the competition shall be to produce a better article, not a cheaper one.

The Book Trade Association propose to further their objects by union among themselves, by stated meetings for consultation, and by the regulation of discounts allowed to teachers, libraries, and other parties.

We will not discuss the practical value of their special rules; but the object is certainly a good one, and the parties actually engaged in the trade are the best judges of the means calculated to secure it.

The wide-spread financial corruption and dishonesty of the times has its roots in every department of life. Plain, straightforward dealing, which asks fair remuneration for service, and is desirous to pay a fair price for all it buys, is the foundation of that broader national honesty which would remedy all our financial disasters; and every movement which looks to the purification of trade meets with our warm sympathy. We hope the booksellers, whose business is of special interest to all thinking men, will set an example of high and honorable dealing which will be followed by others. E. D. C.

THE POLITICAL LESSON.

To all lovers of popular liberty and a pure State, instead of party, the result of the recent elections has brought unfeigned joy.

The Republican party has been a great and powerful party in American politics for eighteen years. Since 1860, it has had unbroken success at the national ballot-box, sweeping nearly all the Northern States, and many of the Southern, with its banners of victory, and holding with a firm grasp the administration of the federal government. The keys of the treasury have been in its hands; the army and navy have been utterly subject to its high behest; and all the vast patronage of the nation it has had with unstinted power to give and bestow.

The Republican party began well. It owed its origin to an idea, as most parties do,—the idea of liberty. The Democratic party (as its name indicates) was born of the same idea, and had it continued to be true to that, the Republican party never would have known an existence. But the one fatal mistake of the grand old Democratic party was its alliance with Southern slavery. That mistake made the Republican party both possible and necessary. No party belongs to history, which is not true to popular liberty. In no country, much less in America, can it hope long to succeed when it forgets to be utterly faithful to freedom, when it clasps hands with oppression, and becomes an instrument to despoil any class of persons of any of their natural rights. The Democratic party, in connecting itself with the power of slavery, forgot the high destiny of its birth, and flung an insult into the face of Liberty, which she was not slow to avenge. Straightway the flag of young Republicanism was unfurled; and, in its second great contest with the pro-slavery Democracy, it came off proud victor, and planted its colors on the dome of the nation's capitol.

But it seems to be the fate of every party long in power to become corrupt. Gradually it learns to forget the grand significance of its original mission; slowly the inspiration of the great idea which launched it into life oozes out of its consciousness; by a series of selfish and unpatriotic expedients it steadily lowers its moral tone, until at last it stands before the country shorn of its pristine nobility, only contriving to exist by virtue of its traditions and that sheer tenacity of life which a once powerful party-organization continues to possess long after it has lost its soul. During the first five years of its history, the Republican party successfully vindicated the wisdom of events which brought it into existence. All this time it was in a true sense the party of the people; the conspicuous intelligence, virtue, and patriotism of the American people were in it. No other party really existed but in name; none other had the confidence of the nation's conscience, or the love of the nation's heart, to any appreciable extent. During the second five years of its history, the Republican party began to show signs of faltering in its high career. Men with only selfish ambitions came more to the front, and politicians, more and more overtopped statesmen in its counsels and its conduct. The rebellion was suppressed, and slavery was abolished. These were the two great historic acts of the Republican party, while yet it was the party of the people. But these two strokes of grandeur accomplished, and the party began to lose its sanity. It seemed to spend in these two acts the great sum of that momentum which had been imparted to it when first it was launched, like an arrow from a bow, from the high-strung popular heart. Thenceforward its wisdom grew to be expediency, its statesmanship to be political cunning, its honor and self-respect to be selfishness and venality. And when the third five years of its existence were entered upon, and the fourth of its presidential successes attained, it staggered into the arena of the nation flushed with victory, yet reddened with the palpable and growing hue of a debauched will and corrupted conscience. Now, Sumner and Schurz might utter their eloquent warnings in the Senate, and Greeley write his pungent, vigorous, and wholesome criticisms in the Tribune; now, thousands upon thousands of true and honest Republicans might make their brave and manly protest at the ballot-box,—it all availed not a whit. The party was drunk with continuous victory; it was waxen fat with the spoils thereof, and it was ready to kick with asinine stupidity against every prick of statesmen's admonition and increasing popular indignation.

But there is an insuperable limit set to the extent to which any party can go in the repudiation of its own principles, and the tampering with the purity of the State entrusted to its keeping. The Republican party has now reached that limit in its own history, and it must stop short and turn square round, or its days of power in Washington will be few and infelicitous. Instead of repudiating principles, it must now repudiate men,—and henceforward it behooves it to be very careful that it repudiates the right men; for hitherto it has slain some whose ghosts have since come back to trouble it. It must cease to be the party of politicians, and become once more the party of the people; otherwise it may expect that the people will continue in that process of administering discipline to it, upon which they evidently have entered now so vigorously.

And yet the recent political revulsion in this country conveys to my mind a more transcendent lesson than that I am able to gather from the mere punishment of the Republican party, which is involved in it. It leads me to hope that our American people are slowly learning that it is wisdom to keep their politics nearer home and more under their own immediate supervision, instead of letting them be taken so largely to Washington, and dealt out there among office-holders and office-seekers, as a crew of canal boatmen might deal out cards in a game of "poker;" that they are getting to be less disposed to let out their government as a job to a class of professed politicians of any party, and more inclined to see if they cannot govern themselves with less fuss about it as well as less corruption. I say, I am led to hope that this is the case; but I do not know to what extent this hope is well-founded. Yet I see that one of the new demands of the present political revolutionists is—"Short legislative sessions, and the abolition of special legislation except in extreme cases." This looks in the right direction,—the direction of less politics, and more real social ethics,—the direction of less government by a class for a class, and of more individual responsibility of thought and action. It looks in the direction of that good old Democratic doctrine of local self-government and individual sovereignty,—a doctrine which we in this nation of late have had too little regard for. I trust we shall gradually yet surely find our way back to it from all that tendency to centralization and "Cæsarism," which the civil war entailed upon us.

I confess that it is because I find this hope of a revival of pure Jeffersonian Democracy new-born within me, that I specially rejoice in the recent political overturning in this land. I do not care so much that one party shall be put down and another put up, as that all mere parties shall be put down and THE PEOPLE put up to be their own rulers in their own individual homes and hearts. In a real republic, no party ought to have any existence as a party, but only as a temporary instrument to work the will and the welfare, not alone of the majority, but also of the minority of the people. Majorities have no right to rule at the expense of the rights of minorities,—as is the case when mere party-politics prevail. It ought to be understood that no party should win at the polls in any election, but that the people should always win; and that neither the Democratic party nor the Republican party should ever be in power at Washington, but that the people should always be in power there. When this is understood, then no matter whether we have an Administration for one term or ten terms, or no term at all; the will of the whole people may administer itself by whatever means is available to its need. CONSTITUTION AND PLATFORM

OF THE FREE THOUGHT ASSOCIATION OF LAKE CITY, MINN.

[The following was received several months ago, mislaid, and at last discovered again. It is now published with apologies for the mischance.—ED.]

ARTICLE I.

The name of this organization shall be The Free Thought Association of Lake City.

ARTICLE II.

WHEREAS, In union there is strength, and in a multitude of counsellors there is wisdom; therefore, we associate ourselves together for the purpose of mutual improvement, and to elicit and promulgate the light of truth for the promotion of Free Thought and Action throughout our country and the world in general, and especially in Lake City.

ARTICLE III.

WHEREAS, It is self evident that, if we accept a truth upon its simple announcement, we should necessarily on the same principle accept an error; therefore we hold it to be not only our privilege, but our positive duty, to employ our reason and every means within our reach in determining what is true and what is false.

ARTICLE IV.

WHEREAS, The rights of conscience and private judgment in matters of religion are natural, sacred, and ought to be inviolable; therefore we are opposed to any power, authority, organization, or association, which may attempt by any means whatever to abridge their free exercise, and will exert our influence to oppose any such attempts or designs, coming from any source whatever.

ARTICLE V.

WHEREAS, Our National Constitution is strictly secular; and

WHEREAS, It was the intention of the framers of that instrument that the National and State laws and governments should correspond with this, as well as with its other measures; and

WHEREAS, We think it a wise and beneficent provision whereby no special sect or religion can be established or supported by the laws, the governments, or the public funds, but all be protected;

THEREFORE, We are opposed to any and all violations of the spirit of this provision of our national constitution, and also to any amendments of it by which this provision may be rendered null, thereby virtually uniting Church and State.

ARTICLE VI.

The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, conversations, essays, addresses, lectures, music, the platform and the press, and such other means as circumstances may warrant.

ARTICLE VII.

Such measures shall be adopted for furnishing funds for the Association as shall be prescribed in the by-laws by a two-thirds vote of the members present at a meeting for that purpose.

ARTICLE VIII.

The officers of the Association shall be a President, Vice-President, Secretary, Corresponding Secretary, Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of five members, all of whom shall be elected annually by ballot. Their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to those offices.

ARTICLE IX.

Any person may become a member of this Association by signing the Constitution and By-Laws, but only those who pay at least one dollar a year shall be entitled to vote upon any question of finance or for a change of this Constitution.

ARTICLE X.

This Constitution and By-Laws may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, providing that a public notice of such amendments shall have been given at a regular meeting of the Association at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

PLATFORM.

We intend our platform to be broad enough for all candid thinkers, and we invite all who think freely for themselves, and are ready to be true to their convictions, to unite with us in the search for truth, and to labor with us for the development of true and enlightened humanity.

Come, Materialists, Spiritualists, Naturalists, Christians, extra-Christians, anti-Christians, Deists, Atheists, Free Religionists, Rationalists, Mohammedans, and Pagans, come, meet together and exchange thoughts.

"Truth is a prize wherever found,
On heathen or on Christian ground."

We receive as useful every fact which reason and science can interpret, and recognize human reason, human conscience, and human love, as the grand agents which are to banish from the earth ignorance, vice, poverty, superstition, and misery, and hasten the time when intelligence, truth, virtue, and happiness shall reign universal, and man be the joyous recipient of all that is good and true.

OFFICERS FOR 1874.

President, A. Glines; Vice-President, Mrs. E. Wilson; Secretary, T. B. Whipple; Corresponding Secretary, D. K. Boutelle; Treasurer, J. G. Richardson.

THE RIGHT AND WRONG OF PROHIBITION.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—THE INDEX of October 8 contains an article with the above caption by Mr. Einstein in reply to my first article on "Prohibition;" and, if the subject or your patience is not quite exhausted, I would say with one of old: "Let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak yet but this once."

I suppose I ought to consider myself fortunate in being excepted from the "soft impeachment" which Mr. Einstein deems proper to present against prohibitionists generally, and I do confess to a feeling of gratification that I have been able to express my earnest convictions without giving offence.

While making no pretensions to be anything else than "a plain, blunt man" myself, I can appreciate courtesy in others, desire to reciprocate it, and hope still to deserve it.

Mr. Einstein says: "Your recent lecture answers and refutes most of Mr. Hoover's arguments." I presume, Mr. Editor, that you do not dissent from that opinion; and if I also could concur in it, the necessity for writing this article would be entirely obviated. Since the receipt of Mr. Einstein's article, I have carefully re-read the lecture referred to, as well as the articles bearing on the subject, and, if my arguments are all "refuted," I confess my inability to realize it. If I were disposed to be tenacious, I might mention several points that in my estimation, at least, have not been met; but, as I cannot say all I wish to in a "short" article, I will forego the pleasure of replying to Mr. Einstein's points seriatim, and join issue on the main question: "The Right and Wrong of Prohibition."

If I have already committed "a great and fundamental mistake," I shall most probably aggravate it by the following views of right and wrong, which by your leave I will state in the dogmatic form:—

Right and wrong are not absolute qualities at all, but simply words used to express a relation. Now in all relations a standard of comparison is contemplated. In the case under consideration, what is that standard? I reply, The constitution of man, or human nature. Leaving out of the question all professed revelations, it occurs to me that "the chief end of man" is the happiness of the individual and the race, or the greatest good to the greatest number. Any act, thing, or quality is good or right in proportion as it contributes to the comfort and prosperity of mankind, and evil or wrong exactly in proportion as it detracts therefrom; in other words, utility is the criterion of morality. The constitution of man is such that he requires, for his individual well-being and perpetuity of the race, daily food and wholesome drink. Now let us apply this test to alcohol.

The universal experience of mankind, as well as the closest scientific investigation, prove conclusively (St. Paul and Dr. Anstie to the contrary notwithstanding) that there is not a particle of aliment in alcohol, tobacco, opium, or hasheesh.

"The evidence is all-perfect that alcohol gives no potential power to brain or muscle."—Popular Science Review.

"Stimulation means abstracted, not added, force."—Quarterly Journal of Science.

Tongue cannot tell, and pen cannot write, the evils that inevitably follow, whenever men are thoughtless enough to put this enemy in their mouths to steal away their brains.

It will be observed that it is not the abuse of alcohol that I deprecate, but its use. Use (as a beverage) is abuse. My zeal may not be according to knowledge, but I deliberately assume this "hazardous position," and trust to the stern logic of facts to support me. Of course, I do not mean to assert that Nature made a mistake in the production of alcohol. On the contrary, on the principle of similia similibus curantur, it is "highly beneficial" as an antidote to the venom of the rattlesnake; but, taken into man's stomach, either as an article of diet or as a beverage, its effect is only evil and that continually. If, then, its use as a beverage is wrong, prohibition is right.

In so complicated a structure as society, it is a very difficult matter to determine just where the rights of the individual cease and the rights of society begin. This is a problem that has engaged the attention of all the legislators from Menu down to the Legislature of Maine, and probably will not be settled until the evolution of the race is completed. This much, however, seems agreed upon, that the law of the greatest good to the greatest number is superior to the selfish gratification of the individual. On this ground, prohibition is advocated and defended.

Whenever it is proven that tea and coffee make a man either a maniac, a beast, or a fiend, we will unhesitatingly apply the same principle to them. "Have you also considered . . . . what would become of man's morality?" We have. Due consideration is a necessary antecedent to the intelligent discussion of any subject; this one in particular.

Let me ask a question just here: What becomes of "this precious moral sense of man" under the operation of any punitive law whatever?

"Would you prohibit all satisfaction of the sexual passion because some individuals abuse it?" This inquiry is not "quite pertinent," inasmuch as it is not a parallel case. The highest happiness of the individual is secured by the harmonious development and equitable gratification of ALL his faculties and powers. The sexual instinct or propensity is natural and necessary; its use perfectly legitimate; and its abuse only to be guarded against and prohibited.

"'Moral suasion is a powerful lever in the regeneration of mankind,' admits Mr. Hoover himself in his article; 'but it is not of universal application.' And why not, pray?"

I reply: Both Darwin and Spencer have demonstrated that a man is in a great measure the creature of circumstances, governed by his surroundings. Now, when he cannot make conditions, he must act under them as they exist. To illustrate: Suppose a maniac should rush into your house, axe in hand, and commence murdering your family before your eyes; what would you do? You might try moral suasion, but I would knock him down with a chair, bind him while down, and turn him over to the proper agents of moral suasion at leisure. Would my act be right or wrong? If wrong, then all the laws that ever were passed prohibiting men from the commission of crime are wrong, and the non-resistance doctrine of our Quaker friends is right; but if right, then are we a thousand-fold justified in restraining men from turning "this fair world of ours" into a pandemonium of debauchery and death.

"Afraid of having admitted too much."

I hope, Mr. Editor, I may never be afraid to admit the truth. If truth and justice be not the sole end and aim of this discussion, then are these articles written in vain, and you are wasting your ink and paper printing them.

Yours for humanity, HARRY HOOVER.

CURWENSVILLE, Clearfield Co., Pa., Oct. 24, 1874.

RETROSPECTIVE.

DEAR INDEX:—

"The desolation that Free Religion makes in the lives of little children" was the utterance of the Independent not long since, which is deprecated. Who of "Free Religionists" has said so? Whose life among them testifies to this assertion? In the eyes of the Christian this is, no doubt, a self-evident proposition.

Permit one of your readers, dear INDEX, to bear testimony to the desolation that Orthodox religion makes in the lives of little children.

Instructed at the knees of a pious mother, at the very earliest age I was taught the stern justice of God; how great a sinner man is by nature; and that he must repent in Christ or go to a burning hell, irrespective of the highest morality which he could practise; that whatever happened was to happen, which doctrine of Calvinism is in accordance with God's will; that the devil is constantly seeking for unwary souls to drag down to the pit of everlasting burning; and a great deal more of like nonsense. In such things I was thoroughly indoctrinated. The same lessons were repeated in the Sunday-school and thundered from the pulpit; and, as if to make "assurance doubly sure," I was schooled in Alexander's Evidences of Christianity, Edwards on Redemption, Nelson on Infidelity, and Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress in which I delighted as my religious Robinson Crusoe. On the other hand, I was taught that, if I dared to read "infidel books," I should certainly go straight to—destruction. At an early age I was received into the church; how could I help it? I was consulted as little in this matter concerning my individual wishes as I was in my birth into the world. It is no disgrace to be born, but it is (as I used to think, although I dared not say so) a disgrace, or at least disagreeable, to be forced, nolens volens, to believe as a duty because others do. In view of this, it is patent to all that faith of whatever religion (in the exclusive sense) is merely accidental; and except for my birth, I might have been taught the doctrines of Islam instead of Jesus, at the knees of a Mohammedan mother. Those early days of mine were full of fears, cruel fears, of unexpectedly meeting the devil; and often after repeating—

"Now I lay me down to sleep," and

"Our Father who art in heaven,"

I thought, What if

"I should die before I wake"?

Shall I be carried off to that "bad place"?

How often, in my boyhood days, I asked why God lets the troublesome devil live at all, and where he came from. My mind was haunted by many other paradoxes such as—How did God make everything out of nothing? How big was nothing? Who made God? etc., etc. I shall not take time to describe each step of progress out of the "household of faith." Suffice it to say that it is not quite a year since the scales began to drop from my eyes, so that I now see by reason—not by faith. Then I was a trembling slave—now a freeman. No fears haunt me, nor do doubts assail me now as they did then. To attempt to enumerate all the pit-falls of doubt would be too great a task. My creedish chains have broken under the blows of the anti-theological school of Renan, Strauss, Büchner, Mill, and that class. The negations of so-called unbelief more than compensate for the old faith. I am now contented—happy—free, after many years of bondage; and this I call the "new birth." Thanks, a thousand thanks, for the "liberty and light" of THE INDEX, which has been one of my helps in bringing about a full soul-liberty never before possessed. The reputed eye of faith, formerly my own boast, and the boast of all Christians, whereby they can see farther into the moral mill-stones of life than other people, is a gratuitous assumption. I am not without a faith, but it is faith in natural goodness versus "total depravity." I no longer estimate a man by what he believes, but by the measure of his own life.

I therefore conclude from my own experience that "the desolation that Free Religion makes in the lives of little children" is a dream of the Independent—the nightmare of its faith. I shall see to it that, while my children are not ignorant of biblical knowledge, they shall not be filled with the "desolation" of a gloomy faith and husky creeds—unless they want them—to the neglect of storing the golden grain of truth, as was my own misfortune. S. M. W.

NEW KINGSTON, Pa., November 2, 1874.

"IN A FOG."?

An article by Dr. Blauvelt, entitled "Is Christianity Defensible?" which appeared in a late number of the Independent, has called forth the editorial criticism of the Advance. The writer quotes from Dr. Blauvelt such sentences as the following:—

"We have not the slightest hesitation in declaring that what passes under the general name of Orthodox Christianity is not, as a whole, and cannot be without the most radical changes, thus defensible; and that no chance will eventually be left to us but to surrender battle after battle, until a perfect panic will overspread the entire Christian nation."

With remarkable obtuseness as to the meaning of language, the Advance comments thus:—

"We suppose Dr. Blauvelt means that, while Evangelical Christianity is true in its fundamental facts, there have been gathered about it various explanatory and connecting philosophies which are now proving to be untenable, and which raise more difficulty than they obviate. Probably he had in mind the extreme forms of the doctrine of Scriptural inspiration, the ultra-commercial and penal explanations of the atonement, the revolting theories of the imputation of Adam's sin, the physical conceptions of regeneration (?), the repellent manner of setting forth predestination, the insistence, upon merely technical grounds, of final condemnation apart from inherent character."

It is possible that the writer of the above has been able to persuade himself in his own mind that it is against such antiquated wind-mills as these that Dr. Blauvelt predicts such terrific onslaughts are to be made. But he will hardly be able to impart this comfortable confidence to any considerable portion of his readers.

Instead of "extreme forms of doctrine, ultra-commercial and penal views," the almost universal cry in our day is of the temporizing spirit which pervades the pulpit, the laxness and looseness with which even essential dogmas are proclaimed. With the exceptions, perhaps, of Spurgeon and Talmage, what preacher of passable education and culture deals now-a-days in the physical horrors of the old-time hell?

No; it is the fundamental facts themselves against which the resistless tide of modern thought and investigation is directed. There is for them no "extreme form" and no compromise. Either Jesus was God or he was not. Either his death atones for the sins of the world or it does not. Either there is an eternity of misery in store for the unbelieving or there is not. It is to these fundamental doctrines, the feeding roots of the theological tree, that the axe is beginning to be laid. How much better to meet the issues fairly than to nourish such fond delusions as those of the Advance! H. L. B. B.

A CASE OF SPIRIT-RETURN.

It has been often said, by those who are not believers in the Spiritualists' theory of the possibility of the return of departed spirits, that if spirits can return we should get information of ships which have been lost, and of the crews who have perished; seeming to imply that such an occurrence would place beyond the possibility of doubt the truth of spiritual return.

I will now write the account of an incident which took place during my first investigations of this subject, which to my mind proved beyond a doubt the fact that a spirit can return, and that it can communicate with those who are living in the human form.

In the year 1853, I was in command of the clipper ship Whistler, then loading in Glidden & Williams' line, and bound for San Francisco. The ship Wild Ranger was then on her way to the same port, having sailed two or three weeks previous to the time of which I write.

One day, having a leisure hour, I thought I would visit a medium, in order to see something of the then so-called delusion. I went to Miss Ellis, a young woman living with her mother on Hanover Street. After sitting at the table for a few moments, she took up a pencil and wrote, upside down to her view but right side up to mine, the name of a person I did not know. I asked for particulars: she wrote that this man who was controlling her had been a seaman on board of the ship Wild Ranger, and had fallen overboard and was drowned.

When I arrived at San Francisco, the Wild Ranger had left; but I learned from the Custom House clerk who entered the Wild Ranger that a man had been lost from her during her passage to that port, thus corroborating the statement of the spirit made to me through the mediumship of Miss Ellis (now Mrs. Little).

I have since seen the captain of the Wild Ranger, J. Henry Sears, Esq., of Boston, and he also confirmed the account of the loss of the seaman, also the time and circumstances of his death.

The above is a plain statement of facts which can be proved by any one desirous of investigating the subject; and I would ask if there is anything in this incident that looks like fraud, or which can be explained by mind-reading, unconscious cerebration, odic force, or mesmerism?

Here was a woman wholly unknown to me, who in a little room on Hanover Street gets a communication from a person unknown to either of us, of an occurrence which took place off on the Atlantic Ocean, probably two to three thousand miles away, upon a single ship which, solitary and alone, was ploughing her way onward towards the Equator.

To my own mind there is no greater proof of the fact that a telegraphic message can be received from Europe than there is in the fact that the way is open for spirits to communicate with mortals when the proper medium is furnished. It may be said that there is no reliability in the truth of the messages often received. Granted; but are you sure that you will always get reliable information from your friend across the water? If that friend is playing you false, will not his message to you be a lie? Yet you do not for that reason doubt the fact of the message having been sent from him.

You say, If my dearest friends can communicate, why do they not come to me direct? Why must I go to a paid medium? As well might you ask, Why can I not send a telegraphic message on a clothes-line? I say to you who thus object that, in the first place, you may be so constituted that the spiritual power is unable to control your magnetism, or your religious views may be such that you place your whole will-power against it, and thus produce an antagonism which is out of harmony. Do we not know how sensitive are the indicators of the telegraphic instruments to the electric fluid? Just so must it be in spiritual communications; and a stubborn or determined resistance to the controlling influence will prevent any manifestation being given.

Since the time this incident occured, I have received many remarkable manifestations of spiritual intelligence, but nothing in my experience so plain, so simple and conclusive as the one just narrated. I shall be most happy to talk with any one who may be interested in this subject.

Respectfully yours, CHAS. H. BROWN,
52 Kilby Street, Boston.

A BABY GOD "THE GREAT ELEMENTAL FACT OF CHRISTIANITY."

Among the various and conflicting statements by Christian divines as to what is the great distinguishing feature of Christianity—that which gives it its vast superiority to all other forms of religious development,—sufficient notice has not been taken of that set forth recently by the Rev. Dr. Thomas Armitage, a Baptist clergyman of considerable reputation in New York city,—as published in the columns of the Sunday School Times.

He claims that "the heathen religions," as he calls them, are at a great disadvantage with Christianity in that "their gods were not born as children. They were never endowed with the attributes of children. They never threw themselves into the socialities of children. They were gods of terror, gods of passion, gods of lust, gods of blood, gods of might; but they were never gods of helplessness a span long. O no! That would not have been natural, that would not have been divine, in their conception. But the great elemental fact of Christianity is the Holy Child Jesus."

If this brilliant idea of Dr. Armitage "takes" with the Evangelical public, the baby-God is perhaps destined to be as popular with Protestants as "the wafer-God" has been with the Romanists. What an evident advantage, to be sure, for Christians to be able to represent their God in the first stage of child-life, "puling and puking in the nurse's arms;" and in the second, "satchel in hand, creeping unwillingly to school"! In the light of this suggestion, how important become those passages of the Apocryphal gospels (albeit they are of doubtful authencity), where the child-God, Jesus, is spoken of at length as entering into "the socialities of children"—making little dirt-pies and puddings, birds and animals, in company with other little Hebrew children, "dirty and squalid," by the Bethlehem roadsides! And, by the way, what an evident oversight it was, in consideration of this "great elemental fact of Christianity," that the canonical gospels are so very reticent respecting the childhood and babyhood of Jesus, devoting in all hardly a dozen lines to the subject! Dr. Armitage should have been on hand earlier with his suggestion. But this is always the way. In Christianity, as in other things, there is always room for advance, progress in the development of the idea; and the earlier notions may fairly be expected to be comparatively crude ones.

If we had a calendar of Protestant saints (as why should we not?), this suggestion should surely entitle this Baptist divine to a place therein. He should be known as St. Thomas the Less.

Perhaps he has strained a point, and ignorantly or unwittingly done injustice to the heathen in claiming such exclusive distinction for Christianity on this account. If we mistake not, Jupiter and Juno, Neptune and Pluto were the children of Saturn and Rhea; and when Jupiter, rebellious boy, put his father into Tartarus, Rhea committed the little Juno to the care of Oceanus and Tethys, by whom she was nurtured in their grotto-palace. So also, in the Hindu mythology, the childhood of Krishna is given with considerable particularity, and the same may be said of several other "heathen gods." But so far as our recollection extends, no heathen writer ever claimed it as the distinguishing feature of his religion that his god was once "a god of helplessness, not a span long." Here Dr. Armitage, in behalf of his religion, has broken entirely new ground. Here Christianity may indeed claim to be unique and peculiar. The nearest approach to it perhaps, in heathen annals, is that of the devotee who, out of patience with his wooden idol-God, because his petition was unanswered, exclaimed, "Don't go to putting on airs, now! Remember I knew you when you were nothing but a cherry-tree!"

But here, it will be observed, the heathen, with pagan perversity, taunts his God with his small beginnings; while our Christian divine, having a true conception of the relations of things, and of the circumstances upon which great grandeur depends, credits his God with special dignity and glory from the very fact that he was once a helpless lump of human clay—"not a span long."

Dr. Armitage, then, has rendered signal service to popular Christianity in setting forth this important dogma in clear and unmistakable terms; and the publishers of the Sunday School Times have done well in taking it up and sending it with their endorsement into a countless number of Christian churches and families. Who can say that this masterly conception will not yet prove to the Protestant Christian communion what the dogma of the Immaculate Conception is to the Catholic? Time will tell. J. L. HATCH.

THOMAS PAINE'S GRAVE.

NEW YORK CITY, Nov. 16, 1874.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

It has been stated that the grave of Thomas Paine at New Rochelle has been recently entirely obliterated by Simeon Lester, upon whose farm it was located. THE INDEX of last week had such a statement.

The public ought to know that this is not true. The writer visited the spot to-day, and found everything substantially unaltered. The handsome monument, with its bas-relief and inscriptions, stood within the enclosure as of yore, although somewhat defaced by relic-hunters.

The only change made by the owner of the land has been the removal of some loose stones around the grave, and the substitution of four posts to mark the spot.

It is evident that the owner is not bent on any Vandalism. The fact that he set these posts, and took the trouble also to paint them, showed that he wished to mark the place of the grave, and preserve it from obliteration.

It should be understood that the monument is not over the grave, but about twenty feet north of it.

"IS THERE A GOD?"

This question in THE INDEX of Oct. 22, 1874, is asked by Mr. F. R. Honey, and his conclusion is: "There is or there is not;" and if there is, such God must be "good, bad, or indifferent"—all of which looks reasonable. He first examines the proposition, "There is no God," and makes this supposition: "That the universe, this world, and man are this day the results of development through countless ages; that matter is eternal and infinitely extensive, subject to laws which are an outgrowth of itself." Let me vary this supposition a little, and say subject to principles and laws inherent in itself.

In his supposition, varied as I suggest, I think Mr. Honey can find the good God he appears to believe in; for his last paragraph is, "I have one more proposition; namely, that there is a God, and that he is good. I naturally conclude a good God would in some way or other let me know what he wants me to do for the regulation of my life. Has he done this?"

Mr. Honey, let your supposition (and we can't do otherwise on this subject than to make a supposition for a beginning), varied as suggested, stand as the truth on this matter; and you will find from this quarter abundant information as to how you should regulate your life so as best to enjoy and give happiness to others. From such quarter you will not only receive the information, but strong inducements to act accordingly. Please examine closely and report.

THE BREAD-AND-BUTTER QUESTION.

As long as we have to take care of this body, the care of it is one of the most important of questions, and will bring us back to this sphere, if we think ourselves ever so high "up in the balloon" of intuitionalism and transcendentalism. Yes, the most exalted and excited theologian who talks of the beauty and bliss of his heaven has to attend first to that question. The Free Religious Association has a splendid start and purpose; if it is carried out, it will bring us the best millenium which we can think of. But it will not succeed, and must die from overestimation and cramp, if we are too much or not enough attentive to our daily wants. Our beautiful millenium may be accomplished in the future; but to provide for a partial one, and to free some troubled souls and bodies from the purgatory of poverty, I enclose here $5.00 as my mite towards a fund to be contributed by those who feel like myself. I propose to all that they send their part to our worthy Secretary, Wm. J. Potter, and that at the end of every annual meeting, or at any other convenient time, a collection be taken, added to the amount received during the year, and privately presented by the President to one, two, or more (in accordance with the amount) of the most needy in the Association. In order to provide also for good mental food, each one shall receive one copy for one year of THE INDEX, the $3.00 to be paid from said sum.

Let every "hard-shell" Liberal manifest his liberality, and "shell out." Amen!

CARL H. HORSCH.

DOVER, N. H., November 16, 1874.

[Our droll and generous friend has conceived a noble thought. A fund for the relief of those whose fearless radicalism has involved them in such distress as is described in our editorial columns would be a means of great good. The five dollars have been duly forwarded to Mr. Potter, and we wish that they might prove the nest-egg of a large sum to be used, in strict privacy and with tender respect for honorable pride, in such cases as are alluded to.—ED.]

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. REASONS FOR USING THE
EUREKA SPOOL SILK.
It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

WHAT HAS become of the Chinamen at North Adams? Is the experiment a success or a failure?

JOHN STUART MILL says: "Regularity in the domestic relations is in almost direct proportion with industrial civilization."

THE "Moral Education Association" will hold a meeting at 3 Tremont Place, on Friday, December 4, 3 P. M. All are cordially invited.

LUTHER believed in witchcraft on Bible grounds. He said: "I would have no compromise with these witches—I would burn them all."

ARCHBISHOP BAGLEY, of Baltimore, hopes that England will not "dance to the music" of Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Gladstone equally hopes that she will not dance to the Pope's music.

HAS NOT the New Bedford society yet received the official interrogation of the Year Book compilers as to their Christian standing? We have seen no announcement of the fact. But the Year Book's "honesty" being at stake, the delay is doubtless accidental.

THE POPE thanks Cardinal Cullen and his bishops for denouncing Tyndall, and declares that nothing is to be so dreaded as "those spiritual pirates whose trade is to despoil the souls of men." He thinks it all right to make reason walk the plank, and sees no piracy in faith's confiscating the cargo.

"THE BELIEF in democracy," says the Saturday Review, "has become a superstition in the United States." Perhaps America is superstitiously devoted to democracy, but she may quote Mother Goose to England:—

"I'm Tommy Tinker's dog: Whose dog art thou?"

THE PRINCE OF WALES, who is one of the patrons of the London Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, is very fond of pigeon-shooting, and in fact is complimented by the Examiner as being "the leading dove-killer of the lot." Consistency seems to be one of the birds the Prince's rifle has brought down.

THE LONDON Spectator is not enamored of the doctrine of the Unknowable: "At all events, in the present day and amongst intellectually cultured people, it takes, we think, more courage to make a stand against the presumptuous modesty of the philosophy of nescience than against the narrow bigotry of theological restriction."

THE SECTS are given to exultation over their rapid increase. But it is stated on apparently good authority that, while the population of the country has increased two hundred per cent. within twenty-five years, the membership of the Protestant churches has increased only fifty per cent. in the same period. How much longer will the United States be reckoned a "Christian country"?

A LITTLE boy who wanted to be "good" was told by his mother to pray. He declared he had prayed, but didn't get good. He was then told to keep on praying; but, remembering the frequent admonition, he replied, "I don't want to keep teasing God all the time." A useful comment on the parable of the "Unjust Judge," as well as on the constant injunction of the Orthodox pulpit.

"WHAT! Do you smoke?" asked a gentleman of a little Frenchman, who offered him a light. "O yes! I loves everyting dat is vicked!" was the smiling reply. If the reprobate foreigner had merely called himself the "chief of sinners," and sighed lugubriously, what applause he would have won from the elect! But to crack a joke on his own depravity—that calls for church discipline.

THE WARDEN of the Massachusetts State Prison announces that, on account of the dull times and consequent enforced idleness of the convicts, a day school has been tried in that institution—"an experiment which had proved so successful that it would be continued hereafter, work or no work." This is excellent news, and favors an optimistic view of the hard times through which the country is passing.

IT WAS an easy thing to interrogate a few ministers as to their "Christianity," for the Unitarian Association can spare them without suffering in its receipts; but the professions made of high regard for "accuracy" and "honesty" will be put severely to the proof, when it comes to catechizing the societies whose donations constitute the Association's revenue. Virtue requires two "honest" lists, if it requires one. Or does courage give out?

MR. BAGEHOT says in his Physics and Politics: "The nations with a thoroughly compacted family system have 'possessed the earth;' that is, they have taken all the finest districts in the most competed-for parts, and the nations with loose systems have been merely left to mountain ranges and lonely islands. The family system, and that in its highest form, has been so exclusively the system of civilization, that literature hardly recognizes any other."

REV DR. WEST locates Professor Swing on the theological chart by giving his latitude and longitude in this wise: "Professor Swing is simply a pantheistic Arian of the Eutychian type, a monophysite and a monothelite and . . . . does not preach the Apaugasmal Brilliance of Godhead's glory, . . . but is a Macedonian." He also declares that Professor Swing's Trinity "is only a Triadity, a Modalism, not a Hypostatical Trinity, or Trinity of Persons."

PRECISE DEFINITIONS are a great aid to thought. Here are a few that may be of use: "He who steals a million of dollars is a shrewd financier. He who steals half a million is a defaulter. He who steals a quarter of a million is an irregular financier. He who steals a hundred thousand is a rogue. He who steals fifty thousand is a knave. He who steals one thousand is a villain. But he who steals a pair of boots or a loaf of bread is a scoundrel of the deepest dye, and deserves incarceration in a prison."

PRINCE BISMARCK told Herr Reichensperger, in the Reichstag, that the latter "placed the subjective conscience above the objective law," and that "the ultramontanes and the social democrats held ideas of conscience which cannot be adopted as a standard." These conflicts of conscience will continue until scientific ethics shall furnish a common standard of right and wrong for society and the individual. If "objective law" means State enactments only, it has no claim to override the private conscience, whose appeal to the "higher law" is always in order; but this "higher law" is the law of universal Nature, not only subjective but objective also, and therefore binding alike on the private and public conscience.

MR. GLADSTONE declares that it has been a favorite purpose of his life "not to conjure up, but to conjure down, public alarms." Nevertheless he also declares that the mediæval claims of the Papacy have been disinterred, "like hideous mummies," not in the interest of archæology, but with a very definite purpose; and this purpose, he says decidedly, is "to renew a struggle for the temporal power." Hence Mr. Gladstone appears unequivocally as an anti-Papist. Did he but perceive that Papism is the necessary historical outcome of the original claim of Jesus to be the Christ, and that Roman Catholicism is therefore nothing but ripened Christianity, he would be an anti-Christian too. Cannot American liberals supply the missing insight, and recognize the actual state of things to-day? Freedom is by its very nature anti-Christian, and is in peril until she knows it.

The Significance of the Christian Name.

AN ESSAY BEFORE THE UNITARIAN "MINISTERIAL UNION," AT HOLLIS STREET CHURCH, BOSTON, NOVEMBER 9, 1874.

BY REV. EDWIN S. ELDER.

It will be the purpose of this essay to make some inquiries as to the proper use of the name Christian.

Heretofore all religious inquiries and controversies in Christendom have been carried on by parties both of which claimed the Christian name.

Until quite recently, when individuals have withdrawn from the Church because of a difference of opinion, they have insisted that they were Christians, while the Church from which they have taken themselves away has denied to them the Christian name. The leaders of the Protestant Reformation insisted that they and their teachings were Christian; the Catholic Church denied them the Christian name. When a portion of the Protestant Church rejected the Christian dogmas of human depravity and the Deity of Jesus, they insisted that they were Christian; while the Trinitarian Christian denied to the Unitarian the Christian name.

This process of rejection of Christian dogma has continued until nearly every opinion that is unquestionably and distinctly a part of the Christian system, as represented by the churches and expressed in the creeds of Christendom, has been outgrown; and now the inquiry is being made if this gradual rejection of Christian dogma will not logically ultimate in the general rejection of the Christian name.

There are indications that a change in our mode of apprehending religion and its relation to mankind is taking place among thoughtful religionists. The disciples of each system of religion have identified religion, in all its fulness and completeness, with their system. It is natural and inevitable that religion should be apprehended in connection with the particular personal expressions of it, before it is apprehended in its universal relations. It is in the personal, particular, and historical, that we catch a glimpse of that which is not particular nor historical, but universal. During one age of the world it was as natural that the truths of spiritual religion, the beauty of a deeply religious life, should be called by the name of the one who taught the truth and manifested the beauty of righteousness and holiness, as that for a time the planets should bear the names of their respective discoverers. But the planets no longer bear the names of those who first pointed them out.

The query of this essay is this:—

Is the name of the personal, historical, and particular to be applied to that which transcends all personal and temporal limitations?

Can the consciousness of those immediate relations subsisting between the soul of man and the Infinite Soul, God,—can the life to which this religious consciousness gives rise,—be designated properly by the name of any one religious system?

When it was believed that religion had come into the world from without the world, it was proper to give to it the name of him who was believed to have brought it; but a different conception of the nature of religion and its relation to man suggests a doubt as to the propriety of applying the old name to the later conception.

Within the present century very much has been done toward acquainting us with the actual relations subsisting between spiritual truth, and the human soul, and human life and character. We have learned very much about other religions than our own, that they all claim supernatural and superhuman origin; we have learned that any religion making its appearance at a time when ONLY the superhuman and supernatural are thought to be divine will inevitably claim for itself a superhuman and supernatural origin; we have learned that the fundamental principles of religion and morality are common to all religions. Zoroaster, Confucius, Plato, Buddha, are found to have taught those truths that are spiritually discerned.

An acquaintance with other religions has tended to make intelligent Christians more catholic and tolerant; they no longer insist upon asserting their ownership of all religious truth found in other religions, but content themselves with applying the name of their system to all truth wherever found. This partial acquaintance with other religions changes the stand-point of those who would study their own. They obtain a new and more adequate conception of the relation of different religions to each other.

They become acquainted with the process of birth, growth, transformation, and decay, through which the different religions have passed. They note the influence of one religion upon another. They discover the law of religious development. They learn to separate the fundamentals of pure religion common to all religions from those accidents peculiar to each. They find that religions are largely a product of human thought, feeling, and experience; that a religion making its appearance at any time in the world will inevitably partake of the limitations of the age in which and the people among whom it has its birth.

It is a significant fact that an acquaintance with the religious and philosophical tendencies more intimately connected with the Christian system is affecting the opinions concerning the relation of the Christian religion itself to other religions. Christian scholars can no longer think of Christianity as distinct from, or indeed greatly differing from, those phases of faith with which it was most intimately associated; neither can they help recognizing the fact that all that is best in the teaching of Jesus is universal, existing in the nature of things; that what is divine in the teaching and life of Jesus is natural and native to the human soul.

Other changes are taking place which are affecting the attitude of many thoughtful religionists toward the exclusive claims of any inherited system. There are those who not only perceive that religion in all its completeness transcends any particular system, just as thought transcends any one language, but (what is of more importance) they are conscious of religion more immediate than any inherited system can be; they experience a religiousness that, so far as they are conscious, is not dependent upon, and is in no way connected with, the teachings or religiousness of one individual; they find themselves approaching and apprehending religion through their own spiritual experiences. Religion comes to them at first hand; they find in the religious literature of the world expressions of their own religiousness. They believe that the truest religion is a thing of the present; that the relation between themselves and the Infinite Soul is immediate.

This tendency of thought and experience ultimates in the recognition of religion as something transcending all historical and personal limitations and expressions, and consequently in an unwillingness to use any personal or historical term as the name of that which is not historical or personal, but natural, human, universal.

Another tendency that is not without its influence upon the use of the name Christian is the habit of regarding moral and religious truth as existing in the nature of things, independent of any particular expression or manifestation of them,—as sustaining an immediate relation to the moral and spiritual faculties which are declared to be supreme. This growing recognition of the self-subsistence of moral and religious truth, and the absolute supremacy of the moral and spiritual faculties, is the reverse of that habit of thought which has largely obtained in Christendom. The old habit of thought subordinates the truth to the teacher, conceives of the truth as dependent upon the teacher, accepts the truth of morals and religion upon authority. This habit of thought, failing to recognize the self-subsistence of truth, demands a basis or foundation upon which it may be supposed to rest, a source from which it may be believed to be derived. In the minds of those who fail to perceive the self-subsistence of truth and the immediateness of its relation to the soul of man, it is of necessity associated with some person who may have taught it, with some life in which it may have found expression; and very naturally the name of him who taught the truth is applied to the truth itself.

In the modern tendency and habit of thought, the teacher, however exalted, is recognized as being the mouth-piece of the Eternal. The messenger is less then the message, the teacher less than the truth; and the really great teachers of morals and religion always feel that they are to be the servants of the truth; they perceive it, feel it, love and worship it, rejoice to be spent in its service. They would be pained by the thought that the spiritual verities of God were to be labelled with their name; but the great unspiritual world, in spite of the protestations of its prophets that there is only one who is good and that is God,—in spite of the prophets' injunctions that their disciples shall of themselves judge what is right,—the unspiritual world insists upon accepting the truth upon authority, and upon giving to it the name of one who has been its servant.

But there comes a time when the soul outgrows the need of authority, and this growth changes its relations to that which was once accepted as authority. All authority is at length found and declared to be provisional.

Again, whoever finds in the principal religions of the world expressions of the profoundest truth, and discovers that among all enlightened peoples there have been and are those who have taught and manifested a pure spiritual religion, feels unwilling to apply to these expressions of truths and manifestations of the religious spirit and life the name of one system.

In short, an acquaintance with the literature of all religions, the discovery of the law of religious growth and evolution, the recognition of the absolute supremacy of the moral and spiritual faculties, and the universality and self-subsistence of moral and spiritual truth, the growing faith in the immediateness of those relations subsisting between the human and Divine, the recognition of the identity of the personal faith of Jesus with the most spiritual Judaism of his time, and the further recognition of the actual relation of Christianity apprehended as a system to the Oriental and Hebrew phases of faith, from whose union it was naturally evolved,—all this and more is suggesting the inquiry to many thoughtful religionists: "By what right do we call ourselves and our religion by the name of a system every one of whose distinctive peculiarities we have rejected? By virtue of what principle do we call self-denial, temperance, obedience to conscience, love of our fellow-creatures, love and worship of God, by a personal and historical term?"

These tendencies of which mention has been made have been and are most active within the Unitarian denomination; and the reason for this is evident.

Unitarianism was something more than an affirmation of the unity of God. It affirmed no less emphatically the essential integrity of human nature, and the trustworthiness of the moral and spiritual faculties. Having faith in man, it encouraged thought and investigation. It spanned the abyss believed to be between the human and divine, from the side of humanity. Its faith in the human was so great as to lead to the recognition of the supremacy of the moral sense and the spiritual faculties, and also the oneness of the perfect human and divine.

It was inevitable that the Unitarian faith should give rise to a phase of faith transcending all historical, superhuman, and supernatural limitations,—a faith in man in place of a faith in a far-off and rapidly receding individual. Unitarianism recognized in the natural human life and character of Jesus a revelation of the possibilities of man. In emphasizing the natural and human in Jesus, it contributed toward a faith in the natural and human everywhere. In creating this faith, it unconsciously weakened the old faith in the supernatural and superhuman. A faith in the activity and trustworthiness of moral and spiritual faculties will in time remove the supposed necessity of a supernatural revelation of the moral and spiritual truth.

Unitarianism will, by the law of its being, remain a sect of Christianity; but in the fulfilling of its mission it will give rise to something greater than one of the many Christian sects.

Yet there are those who are willing to use the name Christian as a label for all that is true, just, and religious; who do not hesitate to declare that truth wherever found is Christian; who define Christianity as love to God and man. But would not the Hebrew for similar reasons name all truths wherever found Judaism? Would he not define Judaism as love to God and man? Indeed, the disciples of each particular religion very naturally apply their particular name to the universal truth of morals and religion.

On the other hand, is it to excite our surprise that under the influence of the enlarged conceptions of religion and its relation to man, and in the presence of the heart's recognition of the naturalness and universality of moral and religious ideas, there should be those who feel an unwillingness to use the name of a particular system for that which is to be found in every system and which transcends all systems?

"I claim," one of these may be supposed to say, "I claim to be religious. I affirm and emphasize the reality of religion. I live in conscious communion with him who is All and in all. I revere the moral law, and feel the force of moral obligation. I gladly recognize self-denial as the imperative law of my being. I desire to realize in my own life and character my ideal of the perfect life. I gratefully recognize the spiritual superiority of Jesus, the truth of his teachings, and the divine beauty of his life and character. Indeed, I am willing to put him at the head of those sons of God who from time to time have appeared in the world and blessed it by their spirit, their teachings, and their life. I recognize in the natural religiousness of Jesus a very refined and exalted phase of religion. But," continues our inquirer, "on what principle do I call this phase of faith, this recognition and appreciation of the teachings, life, and character of Jesus, Christian? I have rejected, as an essential part of my faith, every distinguishing peculiarity of what for fifteen centuries has been called Christian. Is it proper for me to apply to my natural-spiritual religion the name of a religion every one of whose peculiarities is foreign to me and to my faith?"

If this phase of religion whose contents have been hinted at in the foregoing, a phase of religion toward which many thoughtful religionists among the most liberal of Christian sects are tending,—if this phase of natural, spiritual, universal religion is entitled to be called Christianity, it must be for one of the following reasons:—

First: This is properly called Christian because it was to this that the name Christian was first applied; or,

Second: This type of religion is properly called Christian, and those professing it are entitled to the Christian name, because this name has been so long and so extensively applied to this phase of faith as to constitute usage.

But if the name "Christian" was not at first applied to this type of natural and spiritual religion, and further, if it has not yet been applied to so great an extent as to constitute usage, yet, if such a use of the word has not been made as to unfit it for a name for universal religion, then there will be no great impropriety in making such a use of the word. But will we make a certain use of this word, or any other, regardless of the character of that to which the name was first applied, and regardless also of the use that has been made of the word for eighteen hundred years?

Our first inquiry is, To what was the Christian name first applied? Was its significance as first used spiritual, theological, philosophical, or personal? What were the peculiarities of those who were first called Christians in Antioch?

The answers to these questions are to be sought in the New Testament. Side by side in the New Testament, there are two distinct phases of faith, one of which has always and everywhere been called Christian.

First, there is the pure spiritual faith of Jesus, a faith that shone out through his natural human life and character. It is a faith in the Supreme as a Father; it includes a deep love of the human. Jesus taught this faith in the Sermon on the Mount, in the parables, and other discourses. It is this human and humane spiritual religiousness that brings Jesus so near the most religious men and women of Christendom. This faith might properly be named a "spiritual Judaism." Every element of it is to be found in the literature of the Hebrews; it is the religiousness of Moses, Isaiah, Job, David, brought to a focus in one person, Jesus of Nazareth, the highest product of Hebrew culture.

Associated with this faith of Jesus is the faith in Jesus as the Christ or Messiah. This latter faith had its basis in the supernatural and superhuman. It concerned itself with the official character and mission ascribed to him. At first it was only political or national. We can understand this faith and hope only as we are acquainted with the condition of the Jewish people during the half century preceding the birth of Jesus. For seventy years the Jewish people had struggled in the grasp of Rome. They were powerless of themselves, yet their very weakness awakened a hope that Jehovah would rescue them from destruction, that he would raise up a descendant of the house of David, who would surely redeem Israel. These hopes became confident expectations. The national pride, the religious sentiment, the desire of political emancipation, all united in exciting in the Hebrew people a confident hope of immediate deliverance. They felt that this Deliverer, Redeemer, Messiah, was very soon to appear, and that, in the name and power of Jehovah, he would fulfil the promise of the prophets, reëstablish the throne of David, and drive from out their borders every enemy of their race and their religion. No less confident than their expectation of the Messiah was their conviction that one of the prophets would rise from the dead and appear as the forerunner of the coming Messiah. The unmistakable traces of these expectations and opinions are scattered throughout the Gospel.

When John the Baptist appeared, he was asked if he were the Messiah; he replied that he was not. He was then asked if he were Elijah, and he answered no. Jesus at one time asked his disciples, "Who do men say that I am?" and they said, "Some say that you are John the Baptist, some say that you are Elijah, and others Jeremiah, or one of the prophets." When the disciples were asked who they thought him to be, Peter answered, "The Messiah." This was the constantly recurring question regarding Jesus, "Is he the Messiah, or shall we look for another?" Two of the disciples displease the others by soliciting the best places in the new order of things for themselves. After his crucifixion, two of them give the substance of their faith in him: "We were hoping it had been he who would redeem Israel."

From the beginning of their discipleship until the entry into Jerusalem, their faith in Jesus as the Messiah was uninterrupted. It was not a moral or spiritual, but a political faith. There is not the faintest indication that his disciples perceived and appreciated his spiritual superiority. This expectation of a Messiah that centred about the person of Jesus was so confident, that even his crucifixion served only to give it a new direction. To comprehend the continued faith in Jesus as the Christ after his crucifixion, we must acquaint ourselves with the mental condition of those of whom this faith took possession, bearing in mind that where the subjective conditions are favorable objective occurrences are unnecessary to produce conviction.

There was on the part of many a confident expectation that Elias, or Jeremiah, or some other prophet, would rise from the dead. John the Baptist had been taken for one of these risen prophets. After his death Jesus had been, by some at least, mistaken for John; by others he had been believed to be Elias. Peter, John, and James knew that he was no one of these; for they believed they had seen the risen Moses and the risen Elias conversing with Jesus, and Peter had proposed to make three tents, one for Moses, one for Elias, and one for Jesus.

In these opinions and confident expectations we have the subjective conditions essential to a faith, not only in one, but in any number of resurrections. Whoever has confidently anticipated the resurrection of one prophet, and has even seen two risen prophets, will have no difficulty in believing, and will need no evidence for believing, in the resurrection of another prophet.

After the death of Jesus, all that was needed to give renewed life to the faith in him as Messiah was to transfer the confident expectation and resulting opinions, concerning the possible or actual resurrection of Elias or some other of the prophets, to Jesus, the latest prophet. There is usually a certain momentum in expectations of this kind that carries or transfers them from one object to another. We have a perfect illustration of this tendency among the Adventists. The expectation that the world will come to an end on one particular day is always transferred to another day with no loss of confidence.

The confident expectations of the disciples underwent a similar change.

After the crucifixion of Jesus, the hopes of the disciples received a shock; but they soon rallied. Those who confidently believed that a prophet would rise from the dead, those who believed that prophets had risen, were in a condition to believe that the last prophet had risen from the dead. This hopeful expectation, becoming more confident, at last became conviction; their old faith in him while living was confirmed. "The Messiah had come," they asserted, "had been put to death, had risen from the dead, had ascended on high, whence he would come again to redeem his people." The two old faiths, the one in a risen prophet and the other in the Messiah, were united in one and the same person, Jesus, the Prophet and Messiah. This was the new faith that took possession of men. They knew who the Messiah was; they had seen him, were his friends; there was no more uncertainty except as to the time when he would reappear; they had only to wait his immediate coming.

We can get very near this faith in the discourses of Peter and the book of Revelation. In the second chapter of Acts, Peter is represented as converting three thousand in one day. We have the substance of his discourse. Peter tells his hearers, who were Jews, that "Jesus the Nazarene, a man approved of God by miracle, wonder, and sign [there is no hint of the recognition and appreciation of the moral and spiritual superiority of Jesus], being delivered up, the Jews crucified; but God raised him up, and hath made him Lord and Christ." To what were these three thousand converted in one day? So far as there is any indication in the record, they were converted from an expectation that the Messiah would come to a confident faith that he had come,—had been put to death, had risen from the dead, had ascended on high, whence he would come again to redeem his people. The old expectation was Jewish; when transferred to the Christ it was called Christian. It was to those who were impatiently looking for the immediate reappearance of Christ that the name Christian was originally given. The change from the Jewish to the Christian faith was but a step. The Jewish hope and expectation concerning a Messiah were brought to a point about the person of the Messiah. It was into this faith that the eunuch was baptized by Philip.

Is there any indication that either the disciples or the multitude were primarily interested in the moral and spiritual teachings of Jesus? Was it the character of these teachings that distinguished him from other religious teachers of his time? Is it probable that Judas who betrayed him, or Peter who denied him, or the other disciples who deserted him at the time of his arrest and crucifixion, or the multitude who shouted "Hosanna to the son of David" one day, and who cried out "crucify him" on one of the following days,—is it probable that all or many of these either recognized and appreciated or were affected by his moral and religious teachings? Was it the Hebrew prophet or the official character ascribed to him, was it the recognition of his spiritual superiority or the hope that he would redeem Israel, was it the truth of his teachings, the beauty of his natural, human life, or the signs, wonders, and miracles,—in short, was it the faith OF Jesus or a faith IN Jesus as the supernatural Christ, that constituted the substance of Christianity at the time the first three Gospels were written?

Was the name "Christian" applied to individuals because "they had all things in common" or "loved one another," or was the name given to them because of their personal faith in Jesus as the Christ? So much for the first inquiry regarding the first use of the name.

As regards the second question, "To what has the name Christian been universally applied during eighteen centuries?" it is impossible in this connection to examine every controversy in which a definition of Christianity, or the determinatian of Christian dogma, has been discussed and decided.

There is only time to call attention to the fact that the great controversies of Christendom have had reference to the official, superhuman, and supernatural character and mission ascribed to Jesus. The conception of Jesus as the Christ has undergone many changes.

The Christianity of the Jews very soon outgrew Jewish limitations when it came in contact with Greek philosophy and Oriental mysticism. The Christianity of the Fourth Gospel is as unlike that of the Synoptics as Greek thought is unlike Hebrew thought. To the Hebrew Christian Jesus was the Messiah, the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world. To the writer of the Fourth Gospel Jesus is the logos, the power or being through whom all things were created. He was an incarnation and manifestation of God. A little more than a century later he was identified with God. From that time until the present has not a faith in Jesus as the supernatural Christ been the corner-stone of the Christian Church?

Has the name "Christian" ever been applied by any church, sect, or council to any truth of morals or religion separated from the official character ascribed to the Hebrew Prophet? Has natural religion, devoutness, moral feeling, spiritual insight, the possession of the very spirit of Jesus, been held to constitute one a Christian? Has not the Roman Catholic Church, the Greek Church, and every one of the many Protestant sects been logically consistent in limiting the name "Christian" to a form of faith concerning, not the natural, moral, and religious character of Jesus, but the official and supernatural character ascribed to him? In short, has not Christianity been universally admitted to be not the faith of Jesus but a faith in Jesus as the Messiah? Have not Christians everywhere insisted that an appreciation of his spiritual superiority, the possession of his spirit, a participation in his religious consciousness is not enough to entitle one to the Christian name? Has any form of faith, any phase of religion however profound, satisfying, and ennobling, been named Christian that did not have for its conscious source, its limit, or its object, the personality of the Christ?

What is the present usage? The usage of the millions of the Roman Catholic Church, the usage of the millions of the Greek Church, the usage of the millions of the Protestant sects is, as regards a general definition of the word Christian and its use, quite uniform. Indeed, a large majority of those who find it necessary to apply the term "liberal" to their Christianity agree with the unnumbered millions of Catholic and Evangelical Christians in that they insist that the name "Christian" belongs only to those whose faith concerns itself with the Christ. Though at the same time not a few of these latter will no less strenuously insist that goodness is Christian,—temperance, self-denial, integrity, humility; that truth wherever found, love to God and man wherever manifested, is Christian. If present usage establishes anything beyond question it is this: that no degree or quality of righteousness and sprituality, self-sacrifice, integrity, purity of motive and affection, beauty of life and divineness of character, constitutes one a Christian, or properly entitles one to the Christian name.

The name was first applied, and for eighteen hundred years has continued to be applied, to a particular faith, a faith whose form changes but whose essence is the same; namely, a faith in the Christ.

There are, however, a few, a very few, who, in spite of this long-continued usage, apply the name Christian to the personal faith or religion of Jesus as taught in his words, manifested in his life, and embodied in his character. They include in the term Christianity the religious consciousness of Jesus, his sense of the divine, his spiritual insight, his habit of self-denial, his love of his brother-man, his glad obedience to the highest, his feeling of intimate relationship with the Heavenly Father,—whoever possesses and manifests this faith is by these very few called a Christian.

But this phase of faith is natural religion, and to designate this with the name of the faith of one man is to identify the faith of one individual who lived eighteen hundred years ago with the growing and deepening faith of humanity.

The identification of the faith of one man with the faith of mankind in all its excellence and perfection is very similar to that identification of the person of Jesus with God; in both cases it is the identification of a part with the whole.

It is true that wherever the idealizing tendency is active, the merest outline of a life or character will be filled with an ideal excellence; all virtues, all truth, all excellence in life and character will be as it were projected into the far-off object.

Do not those who identify the teachings of Jesus with all truth and religion, and the excellence and beauty of his life and character with the beauty of all life and character, do they not idealize that one far-off man?

Indeed, is it conceivable that one man, surrounded by one class of circumstances, should exhibit every virtue that is required of mankind amid all the changing conditions and circumstances of human life? Can any one man be a sufficient example for all men? Can one man reveal the possibilities of all men? Does the personal faith of one contain and express the faiths of all? But the identification of religion as manifested in the life of Jesus with religion in all its many-sided completeness took place at a time when Jesus was identified with God. Will not the denial of the deity of Jesus and the affirmation of his humanity inevitably lead to the denial of the identity of his individual faith with absolute religion?

It may be admitted that the highest type of religion is found in the teaching, spirit, life, and character of Jesus. Is this a sufficient reason for calling religion Christian? Plato was an eminent philosopher; but we do not call philosophy Platonic. Shakspeare stands at the head of modern literature; but literature is not Shakspearian. Mendelssohn was a great musical composer; but music is not Mendelssohnian. Washington was a patriot; but patriotism is not Washingtonian. Indeed, patriotism is something greater than any one individual manifestation of it. Jesus, the Prophet of Nazareth, was filled with a sense of the divine and a love of the human; he was richly endowed with spiritual insight; the truth, the spirit, and the power that reveal the Divine to the human and raise the human to the Divine were manifested through his word, his life, and his character. Does this make religion Christian? Is not religion greater than any one individual manifestation of it?

Religion in all its completeness contains many elements: a perception and a consciousness of a relation to the One who is All and in all, the Eternal, the Infinite, in whom we live and have our being, whose temples we are. Religion includes a consciousness of our relation to our fellow-men and to all living things. It includes a consciousness of our relation to those laws by which all things are said to be controlled, a recognition of their universality and beneficence, a feeling of trust, and the habit of loyalty to their requirements.

This fountain of religious consciousness flows out in life, manifests itself in action, clothes itself with or embodies itself in character. It reveals itself in self-denial, unconscious heroism, perfect integrity, devotion to something other than self. It reveals itself in the spirit of toleration, in self-respect, in sincerity and earnestness, in a helpful public spirit, in a glad recognition of all that is true and good everywhere.

These elements of religion are as old as man. These virtues have been manifested in all ages of the world. By virtue of what principle do we label these virtues wherever and whenever manifested with the name of some ONE manifestation of them? If these virtues, these elements of natural religion, are properly called Christian, ought not the Jew, the Buddhist, and the Parsee to call them by this particular name? In all probability the disciple of each system will insist upon giving to these elements of religion the name of his particular religion.

Were Jesus living to-day would he insist upon applying to the spiritual verities of the universe the name of a title applied to himself?

The question that we are considering has reference to the use of a word.

It is a question of philology. What is the function of names? The function of names is to distinguish one object from another of the same class. The objects themselves are distinguished the one from another by their peculiarities. In defining any name we enumerate those qualities as accidents peculiar to the object to which the name is given. This principle is applicable to all names. How shall we define Buddhism, Judaism, Mohammedanism? It is obvious that we can define these words only by an enumeration of those qualities peculiar to each. To define Mohammedanism as Monotheism would not distinguish it from Judaism or Christianity.

Mohammedanism has strongly marked characteristics; it is by an enumeration of these only that the word can be defined; are we willing to apply this universal principle to the definition of Christianity?

Let me suggest a few general definitions of Christianity. Christianity is religion as apprehended and taught by Jesus; or Christianity is a faith in an official character and mission ascribed to Jesus. A Christian is one whose religion is thought to be derived from, or revealed by, or based upon, the Christ.

These definitions are broad enough to include the faith of the Catholic Church and each of the Protestant sects. The one peculiarity that distinguishes Christianity from all other religions is common to all the churches of Christendom.

Is religion as apprehended by Jesus, and taught and manifested by him, greater than or identical with religion?

It is the habit of a few to define Christianity by an enumeration of its universal elements, by those qualities which it shares in common with spiritual Judaism and other systems. This definition of Christianity is the same as the Jew's definition of Judaism, or the Buddhist's definition of Buddhism. In giving a name to our religion or in defining any particular religion, are we to arbitrarily use any word regardless of the use that has been made of it, or will we remember that the use of a word has been determined for us, and that it cannot be determined by us?

The inquiry which we are pursuing is one of especial interest to the Liberal Christian. In the phrase Liberal Christian the adjective is becoming the most prominent word. The truths represented by the word Liberal are no less important than those represented by the word Christian.

How does Liberal Christianity differ from "Christianity"? Is the difference one of form and quantity, or is it a difference of essence? How "liberal" can Christianity become and still preserve its identity?

The answer to these questions will aid in the solution of the problem of this essay. Liberal Christianity represents the most important religious movement of the last century, important not because of its magnitude, but because of its significance, its direction. In the old theology, human nature was hopelessly depraved, alienated from God. Man had nothing to hope for from his own aspirations and efforts. He could not of himself believe the truth or love the good or do the right. Humanity was lost unless means could be devised outside humanity for his salvation.

This supposed condition of things necessitated miraculous, and supernatural, and superhuman intervention, a superhuman revelation of truth, which constituted authority, a superhuman Mediator and Savior. This scheme of redemption was everywhere called Christian. But Liberal Christianity denied the dogma of total depravity, denied the hopeless condition of man. On the contrary it affirmed the essential integrity of human nature. Its real faith was in the human and natural. It insisted that man's highest good was to be sought in the activity, cultivation, and development of what was IN man. The Savior of humanity was a MAN. In the language of the evolutionist, we have in Liberal Christianity, not simply another "variety" of Christianity, but, what is the significant fact, we have another "species."

And now the question suggests itself, Has this species of Christianity within itself a reproductive power that will give rise to other species, or is it a sterile finality?

Unitarianism, or "Liberal Christianity," is not a finality. It has within itself the germs of a faith greater than itself. By its denial of human depravity it has contributed not a little toward the spiritual emancipation of mankind. By its affirmations it has very nearly identified itself with religion, not as it was apprehended and limited by one individual, but with religion in its world-wide and soul-felt aspects and manifestations.

Trinitarian Christianity of necessity associated religion exclusively with, and makes it depend upon, the supernatural and superhuman Christ.

Unitarian Christianity very naturally associates religion with, and to a great extent makes it dependent upon, the human Jesus. What is the next step in this process of historic evolution?

The Liberal Christian liberates religion from the necessitated limitations of a want of faith in the human and natural, but insists upon associating it with and basing it upon the historical and individual. The next step in the line of evolution will be to free religion from these limitations, both of the supernatural and superhuman Christ and the individual Jesus, and to affirm its independence of all personal expressions, its freedom from all historical limitations, and to emphasize its humanness, its naturalness, and its universality. Will religion thus liberated, and freed, and apprehended, be called Christianity, or religion?

It will be observed in the foregoing that our most liberal and free conceptions of religion are considered as the result of what may be termed religious evolution. Hence I can discover no valid reason for the anti-Christian attitude and spirit on the part of those who disclaim the Christian name. To me such a position is unphilosophical in the extreme. A religious and intellectual movement is going on in our midst. That movement is in the direction of mental and spiritual emancipation. It will be its mission to reveal the inevitable limitations of preëxisting historical and individual systems, not so much by its direct criticisms as by the breadth of its affirmations and the catholicity of its spirit. It will rebuke narrowness and bigotry by its freedom from narrowness and bigotry; in short, it will criticise by creation. Positive conviction will be the source of its power; the discovery, dissemination, and establishment of the truth will be the sole object of its endeavor.

HOW TO GET THE NEGRO OUT OF POLITICS.

The broad fact that the Constitution of the United States is no longer to be interpreted, by either courts or statesmen, on the side of slavery or inequality of rights, and that all State legislation, to be in harmony with the supreme law of the land, as the Constitution requires, must not discriminate against any class of the people because of race, color, or previous condition, is but partially realized. While the amendments to the Constitution are acquiesced in, and no party or politician proposes to disturb them, their logical and legal consequences are resisted by those who have not conquered prejudices begotten of the slave system; and there is unremitting effort to narrow the meaning of the amendments, and preserve discriminations that make one class of citizens, politically, superior to another.

It was plain enough to those who gave the subject any study that emancipation implied enfranchisement, and ultimately complete indorsement of political and civil rights. As long as the negro was held to be property in the slave States, he could only be ranked with the brute creation. That was inevitable. It grew out of the very nature of the slave condition. He could be no more in the civil system than the horse or the ox. The moment he rose above that condition, the moment he gained any legal status, either to hold property or exercise any functions of citizenship, his chains fell off, and he stood up a man to be treated, not as a chattel, but as a human being under the law.

Emancipation, we repeat, carried with it every right and privilege of citizenship, and Congress could no more have escaped the consequences of that war-measure than it could escape the control of the law of gravity. The amendments to the Constitution, and the "appropriate legislation" for their enforcement, were results which every advocate of emancipation should have looked squarely in the face. Resistance to these results, no matter whether it came from the South or the North, must, from the very nature of things, prove ineffectual. It has proved so in the past; it will prove so in the future.

There is but one way of escape. The people of the United States may go back upon all the measures, and wipe out the amendments to the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof; but they cannot stop there, if it be the purpose to deprive the negroes of any or all political and civil rights. They must restore the Constitution as it was, and make it possible to reënslave the blacks. Either this, or they must go forward in the direction which national legislation has taken since the abolition of slavery, and secure to all the people entitled to citizenship whatever rights or immunities any class of them enjoys under the laws.

We know of no considerable number of people who would, if they had the political power, restore the dark age of slavery. We question whether, were it left to the whites of the South themselves, they would reëstablish an institution that unquestionably restricted the material development of that section of the republic, and imbruted the minds of all classes of people. The unhappy influences of the system which Jefferson foresaw and predicted had their manifestation before it was torn out by violence, and they will not cease their operation during the present generation.

It being, then, generally admitted that there does not exist any purpose or desire, to speak of, for the re-establishment of slavery, there is but one solution of the negro question that will have the effect of putting the negro himself out of politics as a disturbing element; and that is the generous and full recognition of his rights as a citizen, including all social rights that are not left for each individual in the community to regulate for himself. In other words, whatever rights, privileges, or immunities are derived from political organization or proceed from legislation, whether they are civil or social, must belong as indisputably to the black as to the white man before we can hope for a cessation of the agitation of the question of the enjoyment of rights by the people of the United States.

We repeat that there are only one of two courses to pursue—either to wipe out the amendments, and re-establish a system that will crush the negro out of legal existence as a human being, or make him absolutely the equal of any other citizen, and then leave him to work out the problem of his existence as an individual and a race upon the same terms and conditions that attach to all other citizens of the republic.

It is time to look at this matter squarely. To fancy that we can legislate so that any portion of the people shall be half citizens and half something else, enjoying one class of rights and denied another class, and do it without creating a disturbance, or sowing the seeds of discord and civil trouble, is a folly of which a people qualified to make and maintain a free government should hold themselves incapable.

The immediate solution of race difficulties in the United States, therefore, depends upon the readiness of the people to accept the consequences of their own acts, and abide by that principle of democracy which levels all political and civil distinctions, wipes out all lines of race distinction, and puts all citizens on a common footing before the law. When this is done and acquiesced in we shall hear no more of the negro in politics than we hear of the Irishman, the German, the Englishman, or any other nationality.—Cincinnati Commercial.

THE TOTTLE FAMILY.

Died, last week, Job Tottle, one of the earliest subscribers to the Tribune. Job was an old man and a Presbyterian preacher, yet his one keen enjoyment in life was heterodoxy; his weak sermons every Sunday were flavored with vague mutinies against the Shorter Catechism, against sectarianism, against society itself; he paddled ankle-deep in treason, delighted and scared as were the Tarrytown boys breaking the Sabbath catching muskrats in the creek behind the church. Tarrytown (a Scotch-Irish village in Pennsylvania) bore with Job's revolts against the Westminster Confession partly because it did not understand them, and partly because the presbytery had once pronounced him "a harmless brother, though imaginative." Imagination is a foreign product which Tarrytown will have none of. Tarrytown is in no hurry to take stock in your new-fangled ideas; the women have keen eyes for hats or gowns, and know a New York cut or trimming at first sight. The men know just what value to put on a new breed of bulls or seed of turnips; but when you come to your fiddle-faddle talk of imagination, or higher laws, or progress of humanity, as the Tarrytown Gazette remarks, "this community is not given to kite-flying." All the Tottles flew kites of one sort or another; none of them ever kept their eyes turned earthward long enough to pay their grocers' bills. They were a lean, hungry, visionary race. Their grandfather, a Dublin banker, had "gone down with two million pounds of property on his back," as Job was wont to relate, rolling it as a sweet morsel under his tongue. All the Tottles took the glory of this ancient debt to warm their half-clad bodies, and to turn their scraggends of mutton into a royal feast. Even Job treated his creditors at the grocery and meat-shop with a sublime indifference. When it was known that his family were actually starving, and a collection was raised for him in a meeting of the presbytery, he clapped the moderator on the back as they went out, and challenged him, with the other gray-haired old fellows, to come along and let him stand treat for ice-cream. When a school was gathered together for him, he was wont every Monday morning to take the vote of the boys as to whether they should go on with Latin or go fishing.

What was to be done? Job's eccentricities were in the blood. The Tottles were the unsolved riddle of Tarrytown, the rock of offence, the thorn in its side. The Tottles lived in a scrambling wooden house, with gloomy pine trees in the space which Tarrytowners devoted to corn and beans as religiously as they did Sunday afternoons to the Catechism. The Tottles never canned, preserved, or pickled; they flouted the old Whig party; did not believe in capital punishment; they had been abolitionists before the war, and after it took to Darwin, Spencer, heaven knows what not. Old Mrs. Tottle, a tall, lean woman, with a purple velvet band about her gray hair, wrote. Other widows "left" with children took in boarders, or sewing, or clothes to dye. Nature and Nature's God in Tarrytown knew no other course open to them. Mrs. Tottle wrote: nobody asked what. The disgust and amazement of all virtuous women were unalterable. Nobody would have been surprised after that to hear that all her children were born out of wedlock, or that she had sausage for Sunday's dinner. The ways of such people lay so utterly outside of human bounds. Julia, the oldest daughter, was a tradition in the town. She was a "do-less woman;" sang a few ballads with a wonderful pathos; flirted to the very verge of danger with half a dozen men; was a Spiritualist, a woman's rightist, an infidel by turns; died suddenly at twenty-five, "a mere ruckle of bones," Tarrytown matrons declared; but whether burned by inward unsated fires or for the want of regular meals of beef and mutton, who shall say? Dick, the youngest boy, went down to Nicaragua to fight with Walker, gave the Cubans a helping hand, and was killed at Chickamauga on the Confederate side. Tarrytowners always regarded the Tottle family with a thrill of horror, and showed them to travellers with a commendable pride, just as they did Jones' big spring. Spigots and hot-water pipes were much more decent in a house than the big spring; but it did to boast about to strangers.

When Job Tottle, the last of his family, died last week, Tarrytown felt as it might if the big spring had dried up. No tears were shed as they pushed aside the heaped yellow October leaves to lower his coffin into the ground. The usual prayers and hymns somehow seemed out of place. One could not think of the Tottles comfortably settled in either the Orthodox heaven or hell. Tarrytown was tired of the unsolved problem. "Seems as if they ought to have amounted to something," said Squire Dewey, going home from the funeral; "don't know whether it was religion they wanted, or enough to eat." That the air or mental growths of Tarrytown had anything to do with their mischance in life never occurred to him.—New York Tribune.

MR. MILL ON JESUS CHRIST.

"The most valuable part of the effect on the character which Christianity has produced, by holding up in a Divine person a standard of excellence and a model for imitation, is available even to the absolute unbeliever, and can nevermore be lost to humanity. For it is Christ rather than God whom Christianity has held up to believers as the pattern of perfection for humanity. It is the God incarnate more than the God of the Jews or of Nature who, being idealized, has taken so great and salutary a hold on the modern mind. And whatever else may be taken away from us by rational criticism, Christ is still left —a unique figure, not more unlike all his precursors than all his followers, even those who had the direct benefit of his personal teaching. It is of no use to say that Christ, as exhibited in the Gospels, is not historical, and that we know not how much of what is admirable has been superadded by the tradition of his followers. The tradition of followers suffices to insert any number of marvels, and may have inserted all the miracles which he is reputed to have wrought. But who among his disciples or among their proselytes was capable of inventing the sayings ascribed to Jesus, or of imagining the life and character revealed in the Gospels? Certainly not the fishermen of Galilee; as certainly not St. Paul, whose character and idiosyncracies were of a totally different sort; still less the early Christian writers, in whom nothing is more evident than that the good which was in them was all derived, as they always professed that it was derived, from the higher source. What could be added and interpolated by a disciple we may see in the mystical parts of the Gospel of St. John, matter imported from Philo and the Alexandrian Platonists, and put into the mouth of the Savior in long speeches about himself such as the other gospels contain not the slightest vestige of, though pretended to have been delivered on occasions of the deepest interest, and when his principal followers were all present; most prominently at the Last Supper. The East was full of men who could have stolen any quantity of this poor stuff, as the multitudinous Oriental sects of Gnostics afterward did. But about the life and sayings of Jesus there is a stamp of personal originality combined with profundity of insight which, if we abandon the idle expectation of finding scientific precision where something very different was aimed at, must place the Prophet of Nazareth, even in the estimation of those who have no belief in his inspiration, in the very first rank of the men of sublime genius of whom our species can boast. When this preëminent genius is combined with the qualities of probably the greatest moral reformer and martyr to that mission who ever existed upon earth, religion cannot be said to have made a bad choice in pitching on this man as the ideal representative and guide of humanity; nor even now would it be easy, even for an unbeliever, to find a better translation of the rule of virtue from the abstract into the concrete than to endeavor so to live that Christ would approve our life. When to this we add that, to the conception of the rational sceptic, it remains a possibility that Christ actually was what he supposed himself to be—not God, for he never made the smallest pretension to that character, and would probably have thought such a pretension as blasphemous as it seemed to the men who condemned him, but a man charged with a special, express, and unique commission from God to lead mankind to truth and virtue, we may well conclude that the influences of religion on the character which will remain after rational criticism has done its utmost against the evidences of religion are well worth preserving, and that what they lack in direct strength, as compared with those of a firmer belief, is more than compensated by the greater truth and rectitude of the morality they sanction."—Essays on Religion.

THE RIGHT OF BURIAL IN CATHOLIC CEMETERIES.

Our readers have heard of Father O'Riley of St. Francis de Sales Church of Toledo. Our despatches last week brought him before the public as a true representative of his church, engaged in one of those transactions which now and then occur in this country, just to teach us that we still have in our midst an element of bigotry and tyranny that formed the characteristic feature of the dark ages. The transaction was brought into court, and our despatches yesterday announced that a decision had been rendered substantially in support of the conduct of the priest. As the ruling of the court appears very strange in connection with the facts, we give a brief review of the case.

A little more than a week ago a Mrs. Wynn died in Toledo. She and her whole family were brought up in the Catholic religion, but some years ago she had obtained a divorce from her husband, and married a second time. When she died recently the priest refused to administer the sacrament, upon the ground that her divorce and second marriage had dissolved her connection with the church. An attempt was then made to bury her in the family lot in the Catholic cemetery, but Father O'Riley interfered. The family of the deceased then applied to the court of common pleas for an injunction to restrain the priest from interfering, and a trial of the case resulted in the refusal of the court to interfere. The jurisdiction of the cemetery is thus given entirely into the hands of the church, and unless the decision is reversed the relatives of the deceased have no power to inter her in the lot beside the remains of her family.

We know not upon what principle of law the Toledo judge has founded his decision, but it is certainly in distressing contrast with every instinct of justice. The certificate of purchase showed that Mrs. Babbington, the mother of Mrs. Wynn, had bought the cemetery lot, paid for it in full, and was consequently its owner. There was no stipulation in the purchase that the lot should be used for the burial of persons professing any particular faith. The lot was her property. If she so desired, it might become the last resting-place of a Protestant, an Israelite, a Spiritualist, or a Mormon. The laws of Ohio demand that all cemetery lots be used solely for burial purposes, but they do not pretend to make any specifications concerning the religion professed previous to death. The law makes no distinction among the dead. In New York, about a year ago, objections were made to the burial in a cemetery of a man who had been hung; but the objections were of no avail in court, as the law knew no difference in dead bodies. The decision of this case deprives the family of Mrs. Wynn of any use of their property in the lot unless they continue to observe all the exactions of the church. It places the prejudices of the church above the laws of the State; ignores the guaranteed rights of a property-owner, and conflicts in every respect with the spirit of our institutions. The plaintiff has announced that an appeal will be taken to a higher court, and it is to be hoped that a decision will there be rendered more in accordance with the principles of justice.—Cleveland Leader.

THE ART OF DOUBLE MEANINGS.

There is a venerable story of a barber who attracted custom by exhibiting over his shop-door an unpunctuated legend thus conceived: "What do you think I'll shave you for a penny and give you something to drink." Customers, in consequence, flocked to his shaving-chair, but when their beards had been removed and they asked for the "something to drink," the barber repudiated with well-feigned indignation the construction which had been put upon the notice over the door. It had been, he said, grossly and, he feared, intentionally misunderstood. To any fair and candid reader it must have been obvious that it ought to be read thus: "What! do you think I'll shave you for a penny and give you something to drink?" Had the present Dean of Chester been the barber thus situated (if the hypothesis may be forgiven), he would have admitted the ambiguity and defended it as intentional. Indeed, his agreement with the Old Catholics has been, by his own admission, obtained in much the same way as that of the barber with his customers. "At Bonn," says Dean Howson, "it was our wisdom to keep many things in the background." So it was the barber's. It was his wisdom to keep in the background the important fact that the sentence over his door was interrogatory, and not categoric. "We were reaching out our hands," the Dean continues, "towards those who had been separated from us by centuries, if by any means, even by the temporary use of language admitting of various shades of meaning, we might come to a mutual understanding." The parallel, it will be seen, is complete. The barber was "reaching out his hand" for customers; he used language "admitting of various shades" of meaning—at any rate of two shades. The use of this language was "temporary;" that is to say, it was to be used only till the shaving was over and the penny paid; and by these means he arrived at a "mutual understanding" with his customers of just the same sort as that arrived at between Dean Howson and the Old Catholics—that is, at an understanding in which two persons understand the same proposition in different senses. Dean Howson had better wait till the Old Catholics have paid their pennies and begin to call for liquor before he congratulates himself on the "mutual understanding."—Pall Mall Gazette.

RATIONALISM.—On Sunday last, Dean Goulburn, preaching in Norwich Cathedral on behalf of the Five Church Societies, referred to the rationalistic tendencies of the age. Taking his text from I. Cor. xv., 58, he remarked that we had advanced a stage beyond the Corinthians in our scepticism, for if the Apostle were now to visit the Church of England he would have to ask it how it was that some of its members denied, not indeed a future state of rewards and punishments, but the very existence of a moral governor of mankind. Rationalism had now for a long time been making inroads upon the faith of the Church, until it had won for itself not only acceptance among her members, but patronage, support, and advocacy among her pastors and doctors.—London Graphic, Oct. 31, 1874.

WHEN THE FLOOD at Chester was the highest, and the water was three feet deep about the house, Master Robert Cluett, five years old, fell upon his knees and uttered the following prayer: "O Lord! I don't like this; take it away. You said when you put your bow in the skies, you would have no more floods. Now, how is this? Amen."

THE TRUE LIFE.

[Written to the tune of "Nearer, my God, to thee."]

While on this earth ye stay,
Oh, nobly live!
Strive ye from day to day
Some joy to give,
Some hopeful word to speak,
Fresh strength to give the weak;
By constant effort seek Nobly to live.

Turn ye with generous heart
Towards those who need,—
Eager to sow some part
Of Life's good seed.
Forego mere selfish gains;
Think ye of others' claims;
Make e'en your simplest aims
Noble indeed.

Listen to Conscience' voice,
Thy surest guide;
Its teachings make thy choice,
By them abide;
Walk ye with earnest feet,
Holding all duty meet;
So shall Contentment sweet
Walk by thy side.

And when the end draws near,
The dreamless rest,
All labor finished here,
Ended all quest,
Calmly turn ye to sleep,
Though loving hearts shall weep,
Immortal they shall keep
Thy noblest—best.

THE "AMERICAN RAILWAY LITERARY UNION."

A closely printed pamphlet of twenty octavo pages, published in Philadelphia without date, and entitled "American Railway Literary Union, including Steamboats, Steamships, &c., for the United States and New Dominion: General Circular," has come into our hands, and is of a character to be peculiarly and even startlingly interesting, not only to readers of The Index, but to all who appreciate the priceless value of a free press, throughout the length and breadth of the land. It sets forth the objects, principles, plans, methods, regulations, constitution, blank forms of contracts and sub-contracts, and so forth, of a widely ramifying organization already in existence, though not yet widely known, at least to the liberal public. The general purpose of this organization, briefly stated, is to acquire absolute control over the sale of all publications in all news depots, and by all news agents or venders of books, periodicals, papers, etc., connected directly or indirectly with railway or steamboat travel in the United States and Canada; the result of which control would be to ensure enormous though partially concealed power over all publishing houses or concerns in the two chief countries of this continent. The ostensible reason for aiming to secure this practical censorship of the press is to suppress the sale of all morally corrupting literature, and to substitute in its stead such literature only as is approved by the Boards of Directors of the various Districts into which the country is divided. But evidently the real reason is, at least in equal degree, to suppress the sale of all unorthodox literature, and to encourage the sale of all publications that tend to favor orthodoxy.

How far this crafty conspiracy against free thought has succeeded, we do not know; probably it will take some time to get all its cunningly devised machinery into running order. But that it has already achieved a partial success is proved by this pamphlet. Mr. G. A. Nicolls, Second Vice-President of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, states that the American Railway Literary Union have had a contract with that road since May 1, 1873, and that "its main objects have been accomplished." We learn from a private source that the Boston and Lowell Railroad have made a similar arrangement with this Union.

Friendly notices and "indorsements from the best sources" are claimed to be abundant, and samples are given.

Hon. E. S. Tobey, of Boston, writes: "I cannot doubt that directors of every railroad corporation, when fully informed of your plan of action, will most readily and cordially lend their influence to facilitate the objects of the Railway Literary Union."

Bishop Simpson writes: "I fully approve the object of the American Railway Literary Union, and hope that it may be eminently successful."

Mr. Jay Cooke writes: "I heartily approve the object aimed at by the American Railway Literary Union, and believe the movement deserves the support and sympathy of all."

President Grant writes: "I have seen the project of the eminent men who head the American Railway Literary Union, to introduce a more healthy class of reading matter to the travelling public than is generally kept for sale by travelling agents to supply such demand. It strikes me as a most praiseworthy enterprise, and one which ought to succeed in working great good. All I can say further is that your enterprise has my hearty sympathy."

Similar expressions of approval are attributed to "an Ex-Governor, R. R. Manager, General, Speaker of the Lower House in Congress, etc.;" to "a Railroad Officer high in position and influence;" to "a General Superintendent;" to "a Railroad President;" and to "another, second to none in position and influence."

It is sufficiently evident that the enterprise of this organization has already made some headway. So far as it aims merely at suppressing the sale of obscene or really demoralizing books, pictures, and so forth, every good citizen will of course sympathize with it; but advantage is taken of this worthy object to further other objects reprehensible in the highest degree. Under cover of it, the attempt is made to enlist the coöperation of railroad managers in the suppression of whatever publication threatens orthodoxy of opinion; and a more plausible or dangerous undertaking could not be imagined. Orthodoxy, be it remembered, claims a monopoly of good moral influence; whatever is unorthodox it regards as morally pernicious and corrupting; and this identification of the unorthodox with the immoral is not boldly and openly professed, but practically hidden and kept out of sight of the railroad managers (many of whom are unorthodox to the last degree) and of the public. Here lies the danger. A Union which really aimed at furnishing on cars and steamboats, and in railway news-rooms, a high-toned literature regardless of its theological bias, and to exclude only the debasing and vile stuff too often to be found there, would deservedly command general support; but this particular organization ought not to be suffered on any account to acquire the control it aims at. It would probably exclude such literature as Professor Tyndall's Belfast address, no less than the Police Gazette or Day's Doings; while as to The Index, the Investigator, or any other free-thought periodical, there can be no doubt of the policy that would be pursued. On this point, which concerns the common liberties of the citizen, the true character of this pseudo-moral crusade ought to be exposed, and we proceed to give some of the evidence contained in this very remarkable document.

The preamble to the Constitution of the Railway Literary Union reads as follows:—

"It is a fundamental principle in the organization of this Union to practically regard the law that 'righteousness exalteth a nation.' Also, the paramount authority of the Bible, the excellence of the Christian Religion, as lying at the foundation of the most prosperous and permanent governments, and entire dependence upon the blessing of God for success in every good work, are hereby reverently acknowledged as in harmony with the broad principles and designs of this organization.

"And whereas the Railway and Steam Navigation systems of America afford unparalleled facilities for disseminating knowledge and wielding influence by the press, it is also adopted as a principle that they should be directly, constantly and fully employed for educational, philanthropic and beneficent purposes, in the intellectual, moral and religious improvement of the people."

The first article names the corporation, and prescribes the territory to be supervised, as stated already.

The second article of the Constitution thus defines the objects sought:—

"The objects of this Union shall be to obtain, by contract or otherwise, the use of Railroad Trains and Stations, and other public conveyances, and all the facilities therewith connected, including News-Rooms and other means by which the work of the Union may be rendered most successful; to circulate a suitable secular, moral and religious literature among the travelling public, and the public generally, embracing Newspapers and Standard Literature of approved morals, and, whether in periodical or book form, to be adapted in typography and illustrations to the work of the Union; and to employ the requisite agency to execute and superintend the work."

Articles three and four provide for the formation of Boards of seven Directors for each of the six Districts established, and of a Central Board of twelve Directors to supervise the whole work of the Union. The organization is so carefully planned as to be effective and complete; a General Superintendent being employed on salary by the Central Board to execute their orders, and District Superintendents being also employed on salary by the District Boards for the same purpose.

Article five provides for a contingent fund of $10,000 in each District, at first by donations, and afterwards by a tariff on the gross sales made by sub-contractors. The object is not to make money, but only to obtain means sufficient to carry out the work of the Union by securing its desired censorship of the press.

Article six provides against any collision between the Union and the railroad companies.

Article seven begins thus:—

"The selection of the Publications to be sold shall be made by the Boards of Directors, through such agency as they choose to employ, and they may be obtained in such way as they shall find most desirable."

This article goes on to provide for an absolute control over all news-dealers and other employés, and for establishing signs and badges as trade-marks of the Union. "The detection of a contractor in the sale of prohibited publications," it is elsewhere provided, "breaks his contract, at the discretion of the Superintendent of the Union."

Article eight restricts all amendments of the constitution by requiring a two-thirds vote of the Central Board at an annual meeting.

Blank forms of contracts between the Superintendents of the Union and the railroad companies are published, which secure "exclusive use" to the former of all facilities for "the sale and distribution of publications;" and also blank forms of sub-contracts with dealers, which require them "to adopt and conform strictly to the rules and regulations of the American Railway Literary Union.

A form of "commission and instructions to Superintendents" is also published, in which occur the following passages:—

"The principles of Christianity are to pervade all our secular, moral and religious undertakings and intercourse.

"In our intercourse with publishers, dealers, news-agents, the Young Men's Christian Associations, with the godly and the ungodly, we [shall] see to it that the cause of Christ and of good government receive damage by us in nothing, but rather advantage always and everywhere."

"Study well our relations to the Young Men's Christian Associations, and seek to make yourself useful to their organizations, while drawing largely upon them for coöperation in all our work."

"The Preamble of our Constitution is a model for thought and action, and we should direct all our efforts in harmony with it."

Mr. Yates Hickey, of Pittsburgh, Pa., is named as General Superintendent of the Union; and Messrs. H. H. Van Meter, J. G. Bergen, E. S. Fletcher, T. B. Carter, and W. W. Vanarsdale, are named as District Superintendents or Assistant Superintendents.

The Board of Directors for the Eastern District, with headquarters in Boston, is as follows:—

Oliver R. Clark, President, corner of Beverly and Traverse Streets.
J. D. W. French, Secretary, 48 State Street.
S. P. Hibbard, Treasurer, 176 State Street.
D. N. Skillings, 5 Kilby Street.
Charles Demond, 7 Beacon Street.
J. Grafton Parker, 10 South Market Street.
J. S. Damrell, City Hall.
E. S. Fletcher, Superintendent, 5 Kilby Street.

The Central Board, including two members from each already organized District Board, is as follows:

Messrs. H. H. Shillingford and F. W. Vanuxem, of Philadelphia, J. M. Harris and S. M. Shoemaker, of Baltimore, T. B. Carter and E. G. Keith, of Chicago, J. G. Parker and J. S. Damrell, of Boston, and General Superintendent Hickey, of Pittsburgh. Two Districts are unrepresented as yet.

The pamphlet is filled with practical suggestions and details as to the "need" of this enterprise and the way to assure its success. It thus shrewdly amalgamates the cause of morality and the cause of Orthodoxy (the italics are not ours):—

"There is a monstrous iniquity spreading itself all over our land, and Railroad and Steamboat facilities are given to it. It is high time—a late day, for the friends of the family, social purity, public morality and the Christian faith, to awake to the tremendous evil which is cursing our homes, society, and the nation; and do all that may be done to arrest and check this swelling tide of corruption."

There are several significant indications, in our judgment, that this whole organization has a close affiliation with the Christian Amendment movement. The facts that this organization seems to have been first projected soon after the demand for the "recognition of God in the Constitution" was originally made; that it seems to have its headquarters in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh; that the present pamphlet bears the ear-marks of the Christian Amendment movement, in phrase and thought, on almost every page, and especially in the preamble to the Constitution above cited; and that some of the supporters here named are also supporters of that movement,—all these things go to point out a secret connection not avowed between this attempt to establish an Orthodox censorship of the press and the attempt to commit the national government to Orthodox Christianity. If we are correct in this surmise, then the Christian Amendment movement is proved to be far more thoroughly organized, and far less frank in the avowal of its methods, than we had supposed. But if we are mistaken in it, and the two attempts have no real connection at all, then it appears that the same increasing bigotry out of which the Christian Amendment movement springs is also the source of this cunning plot against the free press of the republic, and that each attempt acquires a new claim upon the vigilant attention of all freedom-lovers. One thing only is plain: whenever Orthodoxy fairly resolves to carry out these or similar schemes for the perpetuation of its own power over the public mind, it will find no difficulty in executing them, so long as the liberals of the country are so totally indifferent to the necessary political conditions of religious liberty. Orthodoxy has only to use its present strong foothold in our laws and customs, in order to make its power tenfold as great as it now is. There is no protection against a sudden revival of the old and very dangerous political claims of Orthodoxy, except in compliance with the Demands of Liberalism and the adoption of the Religious Freedom Amendment to the United States Constitution. We speak to a heedless and incredulous generation, but time will prove our warnings to have been as true as they were unheeded.

A WORD ABOUT "GAGS."

The Christian Register comments in its usual spirit on the "cut-and-dried" management of the Free Religious Conventions, and taunts the officers with putting "gags" into the mouths of the audience because they have adopted the plan of inviting their speakers beforehand. As to the "cut-and-dried" part of the criticism, it is wholly untrue. Each speaker says exactly what he wants to say, and nobody knows beforehand what this is to be. There is no wish to secure unity of utterance, but rather diversity; and there is not the slightest manipulation either of men or measures in any of the Association's meetings. We characterize as slanderous the insinuation that there is, on the part of the Association or its officers, the least tincture of diplomacy, cunning, or timidity. As to the other part of the criticism, there is some truth in it, together with the customary amount of misrepresentation which the Register never fails to mix with such truth as it tells concerning the Association. There are two ways of holding a free religious meeting. One is to invite the ablest and best representatives of different views to speak on the platform, occupying the whole or chief part of the time; the other is to throw open the discussion to the public, and trust to chance speakers. Each plan has its advantages. The first secures what will most interest an audience, and be best worth listening to; the other secures more spontaneity, and often calls out able speakers unknown to the officers. Each plan has also its disadvantages. The first often leaves people in the audience dissatisfied because their own peculiar shade of opinion has not been expressed at all, when perhaps they would have been glad to express it themselves. The other often inflicts bores and "convention fleas" on the audience,—gives a chance for stupidity, coarseness, vulgarity, personality, bad temper and other bad things, to consume precious time and bring a sort of discredit on all connected with the meeting. For our own part, we are willing to be "taught by the enemy," and to confess the truth he tells. Our own preference would be to combine the two plans, and run all the risks of each: to allot a considerable part of each session, or perhaps one whole session, to an absolutely public discussion, and to bear without whimpering the reproaches of the malicious for whatever foolish or worse than foolish utterance or occurrence might take place. We must in candor admit, as our private opinion merely, that the Free Religious Association would gain in public influence, and do a vastly more useful work,—though it would unquestionably be more fiercely assailed and more maliciously vituperated, even by the very critic that now sheds crocodile tears over its lack of "brave faith in freedom,"—were it to make itself in very earnest an Anti-Slavery Society, bear without over-sensitiveness the odium that free public debate would inevitably bring upon it, and fling itself into the thick of the fight with superstition regardless of knocks, careless of reputation, and resolute to compel public attention to the monstrous unreason of the popular religion. There is but one way to do this, and the Register does indeed point it out. For one, we have always been ready to adopt it, and are still; but it is not creditable to any journal to intimate that the Free Religious Association "gags" its audiences, because it invites them to listen to addresses by speakers publicly announced beforehand. If this is "gagging," the Register itself goes in for it vigorously by upholding the Unitarian churches!

Since writing the above, we have received the following note from Mr. Frothingham on the same subject:—

NEW YORK, Nov. 28, 1874.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

To the charge that the Free Religious Association adopts a close and exclusive policy at its conventions I have but a single word to say in reply. Probably you and I feel alike in wishing there were more freedom of discussion, and in believing there might and ought to be. For some years past I have favored setting apart a large allowance of time for open extemporaneous debate; have, in arranging conventions, advocated it on the ground that such a feature would add interest to our meetings, and do much to promote the object we had in view, as well as exhibit on our part a disposition to give our idea a free expression. It has been my practice to invite response from our audiences. I did so cordially and emphatically at Providence. In New York the invitation was omitted because there seemed to be a probability there that the sessions might be spoiled by impertinent and unruly interruptions. Our idea was, besides, a new one to that community, and it was important to expound and illustrate it as fully as the time allowed.

When the Free Religious Association first held public conventions, the amiable visionaries and enthusiasts who hover about novel propositions constituted a real danger. The platform might have been occupied and the hours consumed by men and women whose hearts were full of emotions they had no public opportunity to express. Our announcement was particularly attractive to such. But this peril was long ago overpassed, and a large space would have been given to free discussion, if free discussion had shown any inclination to fill it. But the invitation given by the chairman was seldom accepted, never with sufficient fulness to make the open debate a feature of the convention, and it became a necessity to provide speakers. These had to be selected from our own membership, which was not large, and consequently an air of narrowness and restriction was imparted to the meetings. But never, that I am aware, has there been anything like a spirit of exclusiveness, never the least approach to squeamishness or pedantry, or literary snobbishness. For one I should be glad of any expansion or change that would give freshness and vigor to our public presentations. Nothing would delight me more than the entrance of new intellectual forces upon our field of work.

But I am not prepared to admit that the plan we have been forced to adopt is destitute of advantages. It has at least one recommendation, in that it enables the Association to give complete and deliberate utterance to its own ideas. It leaves the hours unwasted; a gain that would be appreciated in any religious convention I ever attended, where the unprofitableness was in exact proportion to the talk. In spite of the endeavor of the managers of the Anti-Slavery Conventions, their public meetings were frittered away by this irrelevancy. Yet their issue was a distinct one, their aim was perfectly comprehended. Ours is not; and until it is, the profit of free discussion may be less than its entertainment.

Faithfully yours, O. B. F.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—Your own unwearied efforts to establish the "Liberal League" must by this time have created among the freethinkers of America a strong desire for an organization of some kind, if not one identical in form with that which you advocate.

Without attempting now to canvass the merits of the Liberal League, I wish to urge the necessity for an organization which shall embrace the freethinkers of the whole world.

The necessity for it may be urged on many grounds; but I will mention only two which, it will be readily admitted, are quite enough. First, the promotion of our principles and the spread of our opinions cannot be properly or efficiently carried on without coöperation. We need an uninterrupted chain of communication with each other, not only to give mutual information of what is being said and done, but to elicit all the various opinions and spontaneous agreements which may be held in different parts of the civilized world.

The little that is done in this way by private correspondence, and by the chance notices which creep into our newspapers, is in itself a source of great strength already, and only shows what would be the effect of extending this intercourse and widening the sphere of this sympathy by some almost universal means of communication.

It is of course a grand power to be able to stand alone, and to set one's back against the wall and face the world. But few are ever called to this post of honor, and still fewer find in themselves sufficient moral courage to maintain their independence. As a rule men are too social to be able to dispense with the legitimate props and stays of human sympathy and encouragement. We must nearly all remember the moment of our lives when, after having nursed our heretical musings in secret during a long and painful suspense, we first discovered in the mind and heart of a fellow-man precisely the same thoughts and convictions as those we had been hiding in our own breasts. Our hope revived, and our courage was doubled and trebled, the moment we found we were not alone.

Now there are thousands of persons so situated as hitherto to have been practically shut out from this sympathy and solace, and I see no method of reaching them with the assurances for which they yearn, but in some new and altogether untried organization.

In the second place, we need an organization which shall furnish substantial help to those whom temporal ruin threatens, should they declare their liberal opinions.

You, sir, would share my distress were you to hear but a tenth part of the tales of sorrow which reach me almost daily. Men and women in various positions seek my sympathy and counsel in the bitter trials of their persecution, a persecution quite as real though not so coarse and brutal as that of the Middle Ages.

Generally speaking, the form it takes is deprivation of the means of subsistence, although of course there are cases in which, this being impossible, other means of torture are employed to punish independence of thought. Were I to begin to illustrate by facts, I should require a volume to contain what I have to tell. But I am tempted to give one typical case, because it is just the kind of necessity which most requires the aid of some great organization.

A clergyman, between the ages of forty and fifty, with a wife and family, depends entirely upon his benefice for his and their maintenance. Time and thought have at last landed him in convictions entirely hostile to the Christian religion. He dare not preach his own thoughts; he is still compelled to use a liturgy with which his feelings are totally at variance, and which at every page outrages his reason and moral sense. His conscience is pained by the wretched insincerity of his position, and the misery of that settles down upon his soul—a horrid burden by night and by day. His wife cannot sympathize with him. Her religious feelings and beliefs have been too strong to allow him even to make her the confidante of his change of opinion. The happiness of her life, no less than her daily bread and that of her children, depends on his continuing in this utterly false and unhappy position.

What is he to do? It is too late to take up and to learn a new profession, even if he have the money to keep himself and his family during the term of his preparation.

The bar, medicine, and other professions are all virtually closed against him, for cases of success after change of profession in middle life are rare indeed. What can he do? If he leaves his benefice and clerical work, he does not merely starve and ruin himself, which he would be willing enough to do for the sake of conscience and veracity, but he also ruins and starves the dear wife and children to whom he owes his first, his supreme obligation.

In our present disorganized state, there are no means of extricating such an one (and there are hundreds of such cases, I can assure you) from this pitiable embarrassment. None of us can blame him if he resolves to stay where he is for the sake of his dear ones. One might almost go so far as to say with the Apostle Paul, "If any provide not for his own, and especially for them of his own house, he hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel."

Nevertheless, our sense of right is outraged by this horrible necessity which compels a man to be a dissembler; and on this ground I urge again the importance of forming such an organization as shall enable us to provide, either in his own or in a foreign land, for one who is thus oppressed.

Were we thoroughly organized, we should have schools and other institutions in which ex-clergymen might exercise their literary or scholastic qualifications; were we organized, there would be a registry established wherein varied occupations might be supplied by the various applicants for employment, and temporary aid afforded until suitable occupation could be found.

I cannot now undertake to furnish even the skeleton of what such an organization should be; but will only say one word about it, of the greatest importance.

An organization to be of the smallest use universally must be absolutely void of any political or religious creed. While the strictest regard to morality is made its fundamental principle, and only good people are permitted to become its members, no restriction should be placed on independent speculative opinions whether in theology or politics. It must be established to help all good persons who suffer persecution for their conscience' sake.

I am, sir, very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE UNCONSCIOUS.

BY HUGO ANDRIESSEN.

In our discussions we must start from some general principle. It is not required of us to pay much attention to every wild hypothesis, but we must go to the trouble of examining the great theories, and although in many cases it will be impossible for us to have actual demonstrations, yet we shall generally be enabled to answer the question, Which is the most reasonable principle, the most rational theory?

Take the orthodox believer in a Providence, for instance. If he offers prayers to his Deity for rain, or for any other special interference with the universal laws of Nature, he in doing so only shows his honest faith in the power of an intelligent Deity. Now, if men like Prof. Tyndall propose a simple test for such prayers and invocations, they also are perfectly honest, sincere, and consistent. The pious church-member, reading of the really wonderful miracles related in his Bible, the revealed word of his God, may reasonably expect that if this God possessed such extraordinary supernatural powers in Biblical times, he certainly must have that power now to perform such miracles. But we have no such demonstrations whatever; all the evidences of the existence of any such supernatural, supermundane Power are wanting; and we reasonably conclude that if such a Power at one time did exhibit such remarkable characteristics, the world at present is only governed by certain universal, unchangeable natural laws. But here a dilemma presents itself. Could we, for a moment only, suppose that such an all-powerful, just, loving, kind, and merciful God would permit crime, vice, and misery to triumph, and virtue and honesty to perish? If we assume the existence of an intelligent, conscious God and Creator at all, he must certainly have known what he was going to do when he created this world. If he really possesses all those anthropomorphic attributes, he would never, after the six days' recreation of creating this cosmos, have folded his hands, self-satisfied with his work, and left the future government of the work of his conscious will to chance, or blind fate. This would be a self-evident contradiction.

But there is a different solution of this problem possible. May not the so-called creation of this universe have been an act of the unconscious law of Nature? To develop this idea, we must refer the reader to the admirable work of E. von Hartmann, The Philosophy of the Unconscious, which has rapidly passed through five large editions. We all grant that the arguments of Mr. Underwood and Dr. L. Büchner are at least more reasonable than those advanced by orthodox theology; yet they do not answer all the arguments of the champions of revealed religion. Mr. Underwood is to American readers what Dr. Büchner is, or was, to the German inquirer; a very clever, clear, forcible writer, who possesses a certain facility to popularize the results of modern scientific investigation and materialistic speculation. But both lack the philosophic ability to discuss those important questions which will always present themselves to sceptical thinking inquirers. The very fact that such rationalistic writers as Büchner, Underwood, Bradlaugh, and others, do not satisfy us entirely is a very encouraging symptom,—it shows that there is still a place for a true philosophy which will be in harmony and accord with the great truths discovered by natural science.

The different systems of philosophy may be subdivided into two more or less distinct schools; the optimistic and the pessimistic.

The first one, of which Mr. Abbot appears to be the American exponent, holds that there are no limits to scientific explorations and investigations. This school discards the notion of any such thing as an "Unknowable." "Mystery," Mr. Abbot says, "enough there is, yet not insoluble; and the indomitable mind of man, refusing voluntarily to clip the wings that bear it forever onward and upward, urges its flight towards regions that seem to the timid hopelessly beyond its reach. Be of good courage, O marvellous Intellect, for thou too art of the essence of the eternal!" It would appear, then, that there is yet abundant faith in a bright future, in eternal progress, in the full ability of the human intellect ultimately to solve all the problems and mysteries that surround us at present.

The adherents of the other school do not reject the results of scientific thought, either; but they are not quite so sanguine, so enthusiastic. Their philosophy has been denominated pessimistic. They think they are compelled to acknowledge that there are limitations to our knowledge (Erkeunen) of Nature; they believe that every thinker will, sooner or later, arrive at a point where our human intellect will vainly try to receive more light. The great problems of existence, the where, whence, and whither, the beginning of all things and the end, the purpose and destiny of being, they claim, we will never be enabled to comprehend or to understand.

> "In Nature's infinite book of secrecy
> A little we may read—"

thus Prof. Dubois Raymond begins his famous lecture "On the Limits of our Knowledge of Nature;" and even his antagonist, that bright, elastic old thinker and deep philosopher, Spiller, of Berlin, commences his reply by quoting Goethe: "The most beautiful reward of thinking man is to have explored all that really is explorable, and to conjecture that which is inexplorable."

The clearest statement, however, of their position one will find by reading a very characteristic essay, "Creation, God, Soul, Hereafter—The Four Great Fruitless Problems"—by an anonymous writer in the Modern Thinker, No. 2. This writer admits that the above and "some similar" problems, though ever shifting their solutions, are eternally destined to be asked; but he insists that these questions are not innate in the mind, and that it is merely waste of time to discuss those and all other similar metaphysical questions. In regard to Spencerism, he says: "Indeed, a distinct proposal has been made to make the Unknowable the basis or perhaps the apex of philosophy, the object and sustenance of the religious sentiment. All altars are to be destroyed save that which is raised to the 'Unknown God.'" This is the language, we must not forget, of a defender of the Positive Philosophy of Comte, who would make mankind kneel down before the altars erected to "Humanity, the Great Being in whom we live, move, and have our being!"

Now we may possibly be able to retain our independence in the regions of abstract thought, in the arena of speculative philosophy, as well as in our practical, political, and social relations and activities. We think that, with such a clear-headed thinker as von Hartmann as a guide or counsellor, we may probably succeed in safely escaping out of this labyrinth of contradictory and unsatisfactory systems. Through the "Philosophy of the Unconscious" we may probably be enabled to solve these great problems, as satisfactorily at least as is possible.

It is, let it be confessed, not a very cheerful, hopeful view of life; nevertheless, we are not forced to abandon the attempt of solving the ever-recurring questions in despair, like the Positivist, nor to indulge in poetical illusions, like the Optimist.

Hartmann himself admits that the results of his philosophy will appear as very uncomfortable, void of consolation to a good many readers; but these readers must recollect that they were wrong when they expected to find consolation and hope in philosophy. "For such purposes there are religious and devotional books," he remarks. "Philosophy is hard, cold, and void of feeling, like stone; floating in an ether of pure thought, philosophy tries to arrive at a frosty knowledge of that which is, its causes, and its being."

We shall here confine ourself to merely pointing out the logical tendency of this philosophy, referring the reader to the work itself, and assuring him that its study will richly repay him.

The primitive age of mankind has passed away long, long ago; the second era, also, with all its transcendental ideals, belongs to the past; even the third form of conscious existence, with its hard struggles, practical common sense, and different fruitless attempts at rational enjoyment of life, at perfect happiness, etc.,—even this is drawing to a close: the fourth stage, that of ripe old age, of mature experience, is approaching for mankind. With deep, melancholy sadness Old-Age Humanity will review the past career of the human race, and arrive at the conclusion that its entire existence was purposeless, that all its ambition was vain, that its struggles were aimless. But mankind, arrived at this last stage of existence, will have no laughing heirs; no parental nor filial love will interfere with the calm, philosophic contemplations of the last man; nothing will disturb the serenity of his thoughts. It is not exactly a Buddhistic Askesis. The only desire—and the fact that only one desire is felt yet is the only proof of still continued conscious existence—the only desire will be for rest, peace, quiet, eternal sleep, not interrupted by dreams, final repose that knows of no awakening, no reveries—for mankind will then have arrived at that last grand act in the drama of consciousness when existence has become an intolerable burden. The only desire, we repeat it, will be for perfect unconsciousness; a reunion with the unconscious nothing; the Nirvâna, out of which conscious existence sprang; the Nihil; annihilation of the conscious closes the sad drama. The last man will lay down his weary, tired head to seek peace and rest eternal in death that knows of no resurrection!

> "The end is more than joy and anguish,
> Than lives that laugh, and lives that languish,
> The poppied sleep, the end of all"— sings Swinburne, the inspired poet.

This is the only conceivable end of the last stage of conscious existence, according to the logical speculations of the monistic-pessimistic school of philosophy. It will be painless, for pain is only known to the various forms of consciousness; it must be the only form of perfect happiness, for during our conscious existence we become acquainted with numberless forms of misery and unhappiness, but not with a single illustration of true, perfect happiness.

When we employ certain terms, especially in philosophic discussions, we should endeavor to give clear, precise definitions. Eternity should not be regarded as a straight line, but only as a circle without beginning or end. Consequently, when the monistic philosophy speaks of force as being eternal, i. e. without beginning or end, that it existed from all eternity and will exist forever, we can understand what is meant. "There is no death, only change; matter is indestructible; force imperishable. The form of personality disappears, the substance lives forever. We can demonstrate an objective as well as a subjective immortality, not a personal immortality."

The time will return when this planetary system, with all its order and harmony, of which friend Bradford speaks so admiringly and glowingly, will pass through another one of those terrific cosmic revolutions which have preceded the present so much admired constellations and conditions; another general disintegration of molecular conditions will ensue, and leave the cosmos, this "masterpiece of an intelligent Creator," just as it was in what we are pleased to term "the beginning." Astronomers and chemists can conceive the possibility and probability of a return of a temperature intense enough to be sufficient to evaporize this immense colossus, to reduce it again into the nebular form from which our present cosmos sprang, according to Laplace. The old play would then probably be repeated, the designing clockmaker-Creator would probably be ready to try it again, and milliards of planetary systems would gradually develop out of the chaotic condition of the atoms and molecules of matter. But here arises the question: Have we indeed a right to denominate such a primitive condition of disorganized matter chaos? Is the present state of things less chaotic? Where do we discover that much admired and talked-of order and harmony, and where is, in fact, disorder and disharmony? All such vague terms are inadmissible and inapplicable. In Nature there is neither harmony nor disharmony, neither providence nor chance, neither design, plan, nor purpose,—all we are able to discover is a stern, unchangeable, pitiless law; this law is neither good nor bad, and the philosophy of this law is neither pessimistic nor optimistic; it is the unconscious law of necessity.

AN EXPERIMENT OF PROHIBITION.

MR. ABBOT:—

During a recent visit to the north shore of Lake Superior, I stopped at Silver Islet for a few days, where there are some three hundred miners of almost all nationalities, engaged in silver-mining, and was there made acquainted with an experiment undertaken by the Silver Islet Mining Company in behalf of "prohibition," which experiment was an utter failure, as they now acknowledge. Perhaps an account of this experiment may interest some of your readers.

The government of the district controlled by the mining company is an absolute despotism, so far as concerns the selling of liquors, and therefore any experiment in the matter of regulating or prohibiting the sale of alcohol, in every shape, could not be defaulted for want of jurisdiction or power to enforce whatever arbitrary rules they saw fit to promulgate.

During the winter of 1872 and 1873, the experiment of total prohibition was undertaken. The men were deprived of all liquors, beer, ale, etc., and nothing of an intoxicating nature was allowed on the location.

The heart of the "extremist" would have leaped for joy at the severe stringency of this absolute veto on all indulgence in liquors.

The result of this movement was, that the men left their work, and travelled many miles in search of whiskey. They were met on the outskirts of the company's jurisdiction by a set of unprincipled scoundrels from "Prince Arthur's Landing," twenty-five miles away, and there traded for the contraband article, receiving a poor or poisonous quality of whiskey at an exorbitant price.

The men thus neglected their work, lost their pay, and remained drunk for days together, causing great trouble to the mining authorities, and much misery to their families. This prohibitory rule seemed to produce a fierce delight and excitement in the men, while thus circumventing the efforts made to deprive them of their accustomed indulgence. It was natural that what was obtained by stealth was sweetened with the element of secrecy, and the triumph of contravening a despotic command. Moreover, as the men could never be assured of a uniform and regular supply of whiskey, when the opportunity for indulgence offered, their few days of abstinence were followed by weeks of debauch.

The authorities were finally convinced that their course was unwise and the experiment a failure; and, in the following season of 1873 and 1874, they entered on a "new departure." From utter prohibition they passed to opening a bar-room, and allowed all the men who desired it three drinks per day.

Their whiskey was of the purest quality, being manufactured expressly for them, and the price one half of that paid by the men for the contraband article. Of about two hundred and seventy-five miners, all but twelve take their daily rations of whiskey or alcohol in some shape, and they are satisfied with this comparative moderation. There is little or no drunkenness, no abandonment of work to engage in whiskey-hunting and debauchery, and this second experiment seems in every way a success.

The bar-tender keeps a record of every man's drinks, and no one can exceed the limit of three drams per day; and, as a general thing, they are satisfied with this limit.

The life of a miner is a very laborious one, and not without its dangers and perils. Some artificial stimulus seems almost a necessity to such men. It has been often said that our War of the Revolution would not have succeeded, had it not been for New England rum. John James Garth Wilkinson (we like to give his whole name) recommended, during the Crimean War, that the men in the trenches before Sebastopol should be served with daily doses of homœopathic pellets to preserve them from malaria and lung difficulties. Who would not have more faith in a good stiff horn of whiskey or New England rum, in such a situation?

Do not let us "go back" on our old friend of Revolutionary fame in these degenerate days of prohibition.

May not our prohibitionists learn a lesson from the decided experiment above related—the lesson that men will not be dragooned into virtue, and that sumptuary laws are impossible to be executed? K.

WHITHER DO WE TEND? SPIRITUALISM---MATERIALISM.

EDITOR INDEX:—

Some weeks since I received a letter from a Western man, one of your readers and an occasional contributor, asking some questions, which he prefaced by saying: "I wish to address you in that spirit of candor and earnestness that should characterize seekers of truth." I sat down to reply, and the thought came to me that his leading questions might be answered to the larger company of your readers, as well as to him and his friends only, and thus one reply serve both; and I therefore ask the privilege of a word in your columns to meet these ends.

He asks: "Do you find in Spiritualism a thoroughly satisfactory assurance that immortality is the destiny of man? Is this faith constant and unwavering, or are you subject to the fluctuations of hope and despair that illuminate and darken the religious experience of many, of all Orthodox creeds? Is your religion inspiration to duty, moral purity, and love of mankind, such as the heart requires as an incentive to highest practical goodness? What do you think of the religious tendency of the age? is it toward a stronger belief in immortality, or toward materialistic views?"

To these questions let me give some partial answer, all that your space will fairly allow. As to the first, I would say, The deepest proof of immortality is the voice of the soul asking of the Life Beyond, with questioning clearer and more rational as humanity slowly but surely reaches a higher stage. This is intuitive and deductive, and needs to be verified and confirmed by external facts and inductive investigations, such as Spiritualism, in its phenomenal aspects, offers and calls for. Thus soul and sense, intuition and experience, meet and complete the circle of evidence, and satisfy our wants. As we instinctively aspire for justice, purity, and freedom, and the clear and beautiful benefit of those ideas, when illustrated in a nation or in individuals, buoys up our hope and confirms our aspiration, so to the soul instinctively asking of the Immortal Life the wondrous facts of spirit manifestation and communion give that external help which we all need, more or less.

To the second question I would say that a "constant and unwavering faith," even in the highest truths, is a matter affected by individual temperament; but Spiritualism differs from all religions of authority in this: that it is not of faith (or intuition) alone, but of the interior faith confirmed by external knowledge. As the majesty of some lofty mountain, —rock-ribbed and vast in bulk,—or the glory of a summer's sunset, responds to the soul's love of the grand and the beautiful, so these voices from the world of spirits echo back and respond to the call sent over there by the soul. In my own case, I never have been subject to despair touching a future life, but my spiritual experiences and the thoughts they have awakened have put all that realm in a clearer and more satisfying light,—have brought it nearer to soul and sense as an actual part of my life; and this has been done for many others.

To the third question I answer: that all truth is inspiration to duty and practical goodness, and especially this, which gives me a larger and clearer ideal of life, in its higher aspects here and hereafter, holding all to strict accountability, yet giving "ample scope and verge enough" for the wrong to be righted, the folly to be outgrown, and the misery to be left behind. Doubtless enthusiastic persons in their new zeal may be sometimes taken up with phenomena and manifestations, and grow no wiser or better, for a time, in their daily life. This I think is especially the case with such as come into Spiritualism from Orthodox churches—full of spiritual credulity and of that "other worldliness" born of false views of the future, and of a pharisaic spirit,—but this passes off, and the tendency is to a better life on earth, as the best and wisest course for enjoyment and duty here, and the most natural opening to a better beginning of the life of growth and usefulness beyond the grave.

The last question, touching "the religious tendency of the age," opens a wide realm, only the verge of which can be reached in a few brief words. Ours is the age of a new Reformation, deeper and wider than Martin Luther's; of a Protestantism against all arbitrary authority. Book-creeds, men, or angels may help and serve, but shall never rule over and enslave the immortal soul of man. Individual liberty of thought and sacredness of conscience is the call of to-day. Wearied of theological assertions, without proof or reason, men say, "Give us proof. Show us your facts."

Naturally enough comes the era of science, and its word is, "To the law and to the testimony" in Nature's realm. It does grand service helping to emancipate, to rationalize, to awaken thought, but it is inductive and external in its methods, and therefore incompetent to approach man and his relations. With its imperfect and incomplete processes, it can render but fragmentary answers to the soul's questions. Dogmatic theology cannot oppose it, for in the contest between assumption and fact the first goes to the wall. But inductive science tends to and logically reaches materialism, and no doubt there is such tendency to-day; not to be dreaded, but noted as a stage of growth from the old sway of dogmatism to a spiritual science, a harmony of the truths within us with the truths of external Nature, a recognition of the Infinite design, the spiritual causation—of God in man and in Nature, of Immortality as a truth of the soul.

Science, in its efforts to investigate man's whole being, leaves out an important factor in the process—the wants of the soul,—and "free religious" writers, when not schooled in Spiritualism, make the same mistake sometimes. Leaving out this factor, we naturally enough find magnetism and clairvoyance, and their important facts, well-nigh ignored. A complete science—deductive and inductive—is to come; a science religious in spirit, a religion scientific in its reverence for truth, both in the soul and of the senses. Then the skilled investigator will first question the voice within, and learn what the spirit seeks, and wants, and is intuitively conscious of, and will ask what facts and phenomena can be deduced from these interior and vital premises.

In the light of these questions will come inductive investigations, and the world of matter without will respond, through the senses, to the world of mind within.

Spiritualism will meet and transcend this materialistic tendency, will save and enlarge, harmonize and emancipate, the religious life of the churches, bowed down, and chilled, and belittled by dogmatism and sectarianism. I have no fears as to the fuller recognition of Immortality, for what is of the spirit within us will assert itself as the thoughts of men are broadened, and the great growth of Spiritualism is a sign of this royal assertion.

I use the term as applied to the problem of the immortal life, but make no complaint when its inspiration helps practical reforms, or the discussion of vital questions touching the better conduct of our life here and now.

I ask my friendly correspondent to accept these brief replies to his questions, and trust they may also help a little to answer like questions from others of your thoughtful readers. Let me say, too, that I write in no spirit of condemnation toward those brave and great souls honest enough to say openly that matter rules mind, or that mind ceases to be organized when our bodies crumble back to their kindred dust. I only reach another conclusion, and state it, as they do theirs. Time will test all.

Yours truly, G. B. STEBBINS.

THE NEW ORLEANS LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

It seems my recent communication in THE INDEX regarding the Liberal League of this city has awakened its worthy Secretary, Mr. Wallace, who hails from his new home in Alexandria. In the last issue of THE INDEX (November 19), Mr. Wallace takes exception to some of my statements. Those statements were based upon information given me by members of the League. Their names I will give to Mr. Wallace, if he desires it; it will not interest THE INDEX readers.

That information was to the effect that members of the League had declared that the open avowal of the Demands of Liberalism would be fatal to their business, a physician affirming that he would lose his practice.

Hence the idea of secrecy. I did not say the League was not "open to all;" that is, different from bonds of restraint which I had reason to suppose, from the information received, would be imposed upon those who joined.

The proper course would have been a straightforward advertisement, setting forth the name, locality, and objects of the League.

This was not done, and as a result half of those who heard of the League supposed it to be some branch of the White League. Now I do not object much to being called an "infidel," considering the source of such epithets; but I should object most seriously to being called a White Leaguer, for I have no sympathy with their coercive tactics in politics.

In proof, however, of my sincere sympathy with the objects of the Liberal League, I will say to Mr. Wallace that I will be one of twenty members (or a less number, if so many cannot be found) who will pledge themselves to pay pro rata such advertising bills as shall make the objects of the League well known in this city. Furthermore, this done, I will become an active, hard-working member in the League. I can think of no fairer or more practical offer to make. Will the League take it up? But as the League moves at present, its Secretary four hundred and fifty miles from this city, the League itself, as one of its members tells me, doing nothing, I cannot take hold with any heart.

In justice to Mr. Vorster, the President of the League, I will say, that within a few days I have been informed he is, and always has been, opposed to any secret feature in the League.

Mr. Wallace adds in his postscript that "fully three-fourths of our League are Democrats."

I am glad to hear that, for the attitude of the Democratic pulpit, of late, throughout the State, has been so bitter, bigoted, and intolerant that I had ceased to hope for much coöperation from that quarter in the Demands of Liberalism.

Most cordially will I join all Liberals, no matter from what quarter, race, or party, without a word of reference to present party issues.

Those issues have not yet reached the Demands of Liberalism, but they are fast approaching that point, —issues more vital to the people than any yet passed upon by the politics of the land,—a contest which threatens to be more violent than any yet known to the American people. Earnestly do I hope such fears may be groundless, and that a like threatened contest in the Old World may be so peacefully adjusted as to secure to the Liberals, in this so-called land of liberty, a bloodless victory.

WHAT WAS SLAVERY?

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

If my articles have not grown tedious, permit one fact revealing the tricks of the Tract Society to propagate a spurious religious literature in the interests of slavery. The English writers have complained, and perhaps justly, of our piracy on their works; but I think it takes the Church not only to steal their books, but also utterly to distort and pervert them to suit their unhallowed purposes.

The American Tract Society publishes, besides tracts, large numbers of religious volumes for cheap sale or gratuitous distribution,—like the Pilgrim's Progress, and some of the writings of Baxter, Doddridge, and other more modern writers, both English and American. Of these volumes is one by the late Joseph John Gurney, an eminent English Quaker, entitled On the Habitual Exercise of Love to God. One passage in the book read thus: "If this love had always prevailed among professing Christians, where would have been the sword of the Crusader? where the African slave trade? and where the odious system which permits to man a property in his fellow-men, and converts rational beings into marketable chattels?"

With a wholesome dread of slave-holding wrath, the Tract Society printed the sentence distorted to this:—

"If this love had always prevailed among professing Christians, where would have been the sword of the Crusader? where the tortures of the Spanish Inquisition? where every system of oppression and wrong, by which he who has power revels in luxury and ease at the expense of his fellow-men?" ! ! !

Do you know, Mr. Editor, of an instance of literary piracy more flagrant than that? of a "pious fraud" more atrocious? done, too, in the name of the Christian religion, and by a stupendous religious organization assuming guardianship over the eternal interests of the human race. I do not know, never heard, of its like.

And yet I have other instances just like it, if not worse, done by that same association.

No wonder American authors who wrote books to sell made haste to publish expurgated editions of their works, dropping out every line that reflected on Southern slavery as a sin and crime, or anything other than an institution of heavenly origin, of divine commission and appointment. Even so noble a man as Rev. John Pierpont did this very thing—the only blemish I ever knew on his otherwise spotless, stainless character. PARKER PILLSBURY.

TOLEDO, Ohio, Nov., 1874.

PERTINENT QUESTIONS.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Is it not a pity that so much space in THE INDEX should be occupied with the subject of Christianity—Christian, anti-Christian, Extra-Christian, etc?

Can our best scholars tell us certainly what Jesus taught, or what he did?

If we could know positively what he taught, should we not have to judge of its truthfulness?

Suppose we could know what Jesus taught, and should find he taught the truth, should we receive it because he taught it, or because it was true?

Was Christianity made for man, or was man made for Christianity? Which is greatest, Man or the Church? If Christianity is the highest good, the absolute truth, then why are Christians afraid of free thought, or how is Christianity at war with science? Is it not easier for the untaught to judge what is true and right than to find out what was taught as true eighteen hundred years ago?

The writer once believed that Christianity was the highest good. "When I was a child I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things." I then "saw through a glass darkly," i.e., through the mists of an unquestioning faith; but now I would meet both truth and error face to face.

And now abideth faith in goodness, hope of a higher life, and charity for all mankind—and every other kind!

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 1 Tremont Place, Boston.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.

CHARLES VOYSEY, England.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

REASONS FOR USING THE
EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

THERE is nothing more beautiful than the love of beauty.

THEATRICAL and musical exhibitions on Sunday are to be suppressed in New York.

THE SUM for the maintenance of a German legation at the Vatican is stricken out of the Imperial budget.

TIME moves slowly for the man without resources in himself. But Time is forgotten by him who has earned to reflect. To contemplate truth is to inhabit eternity.

THIRTEEN States of the Union have enacted laws for compulsory education: Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Michigan, Kentucky, Illinois, Kansas, Texas, Nevada, California.

THE would-be Christianizers of the Constitution of the United States hold a public Convention in this city on December 16 and 17. The Call, which will be found republished in another column, is signed by Congressman-elect Seelye, President Hickok, of Amherst College, President Miner, of Tufts College, and others.

JACOB "wrestled with the Lord." The Year Book compilers are wrestling with the moral necessity of asking the societies whether they are Christian or not. But these spiritual athletes do not fancy that their antagonist is "the Lord." Not a bit of it. They are firmly convinced that they have got into the gripe of the—the—the other gentleman!

THOUSANDS of workmen all over the country are thrown out of employment. A delegation of property-holders in New York city waited on Commissioner Van Nort recently, requesting him to employ many of them on public works. Some measure of relief must be adopted, or there will be great distress, perhaps a dangerous desperation, among these poor people.

THE ULTRAMONTANES having cried "pfui, pfui," when Bismarck said that the assassin Kullman belongs to their party, he sarcastically retorted: "I have no right to censure such exclamations. 'Pfui' is an expression of disgust and contempt. I myself am not a stranger to these feelings, but I hope I am too polite to express them." Bismarck is as sharp as Butler in his retorts. Both the Bs carry stings.

BISHOP HAVEN, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, said last Sunday in a sermon that "if they [the Methodists] had money, they would soon have all Europe, all Asia, all Africa in their hands." Such reckless assertions, made in the teeth of statistics that directly prove the contrary, are a fraud upon the simple-minded and credulous, and a disgrace to the missionary boards that receive money obtained by means of them.

HERE IS another significant assault on one of our most friendly subscribers and a man of the highest character, Mr. H. A. Mills, of Mt. Carroll, Illinois, (brother of Mr. C. D. B. Mills, of Syracuse, who is so widely known among radicals by his writings and lectures). Mr. Mills was nominated for the State Senate by the Republican party; and the editors of the Morrison Times, in their issue of October 30, published and indorsed the following bigoted letter concerning him:—

BAILEYVILLE, Ill., Oct. 20, 1874.

BRO. FISHER:—

I want you to do all in your power to defeat H. A. Mills, of Mt. Carroll, for the Senate. He is the most rabid anti-temperance and anti-Christian man I ever met. I feel it is very dangerous to elect such men to office at this point of time. I oppose him for the above reasons. You may use my name as authority for the above statements. I know what I say.

Yours, etc., W. A. TIBBALS.

THESE ARE terrible times in New Bedford. Not a Unitarian in the city now goes to bed without tearing his hair and asking himself whether he is a Christian, and whether Mr. Potter's society is a Christian, and, in short, whether Christianity himself is a Christian. Nobody can find out; gold has gone up; and the whole town is in an uproar. The cause of all this tumult is the well-founded impression that the Secretaries of the American Unitarian Association are going down there at Christmas to hold a grand "confirmation service," clad in the official robes of Bishop and Assistant Bishop of the Diocese of the Year Book; and the little Unitarians (who have all been playing truant from Sunday School, and now find that the schoolmaster is abroad) have all got their backs up, and vow they won't recite their catechism! Such rebellion was never heard of before. But the Bishops will go on sternly with their catechizing. They must preserve discipline. They must excommunicate all rebels against Unitarian Christianity in their Diocese. So they are resolved to make this defiant congregation go down on their knees, dismiss their minister, and confess they are "Unitarian Christians," or else—something will crack!

NO MORE notable book has appeared for a long time, so far as insight into the religious condition of the times is concerned, than Dr. Draper's just published History of the Conflict between Religion and Science. The origin of modern science in the Macedonian campaigns and the Museum of Alexandria; the origin of Christianity, its transformations, its ascent to political supremacy, and its hostile relation to the increase of human knowledge; the great disputes between the Church and Science respecting the doctrines of God, the soul, the nature and age of the world, the criterion of truth, and the government of the universe; the opposition of Catholic Christianity (Dr. Draper ought to add that of Protestant Christianity in less degree) to modern civilization, and the fostering influence upon it of Science; and the impending crisis, no more intellectual than political, between Rome and Reason,—all these are discussed with admirable clearness and explicitness, and a wealth of information which at once instructs and fascinates. It is a work directly in the line of THE INDEX, and ought to be studied by all who are interested in the free religious movement; for it carries this movement forward in a direction that is inevitable. As shown by the advertisement on our last page, it will be sent to any order from this office.

THE DUNDEE (Scotland) Advertiser has this interesting statement: "It is not generally known that a series of elaborate experiments intended to illustrate the laws affecting the variation and selection of species have been for some years going on under the direction of able and intelligent naturalists. These experiments were begun soon after the appearance of Mr. Darwin's great work, and their object is to discover the extent to which by persistent effort the species may be varied, to what degree particular organs may be changed by a different circumstance and condition, and how far feeble and rudimentary development may be increased and accelerated by special conditions and wants. These experiments are carried out with the utmost care, and their results recorded with accuracy; and they will no doubt, in due time, throw much light on the doctrines of development and natural selection. The period during which they have been conducted has as yet been too brief to yield important results, and they may possibly require to be carried on for more than half a century before their scientific value is really ascertained. These experiments are under the direct supervision of nearly all the more eminent naturalists of the day, including Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Darwin, and Mr. Wallace; and they will be the first sustained scientific test to which the laws affecting the variation and origin of the species have been subjected."

Lessons from the Elections

FOR THE VICTORS AND THE VANQUISHED.

A DISCOURSE BEFORE THE NEW BEDFORD SOCIETY, NOVEMBER 9, 1874.

BY WILLIAM J. POTTER.

Since the Civil War closed, putting an end to the great anti-slavery struggle, the American pulpit has had comparative respite from the charge of preaching politics. Yet so long as politics should mean the art of securing justice between man and man through a well-ordered government, and so long as one of the noblest practical ends of religion is justice, a minister of religion need make no apologies for bringing politics into the pulpit. The details of political questions, the petty issues, whether local or national, on which parties so often divide, the mere partisanship of parties, and even the higher but still essentially material problems of political economy on which men equally honest and thoughtful may hold different views,—these things he will properly leave for other places, only bespeaking for them, as for the whole conduct of life, individual application of the moral law. But on all political questions and movements in which the application of principles of justice and honesty to civil law and to governmental administration is directly concerned, the pulpit has not only a right but a duty to utter its message.

The conditions of such a question and movement the elections of last Tuesday have presented to the citizens of the United States. For the first time since 1860, when the rebellion began, the national House of Representatives at Washington is to pass nominally into the control of the party, under the closing days of whose long régime the secessionist conspiracy in behalf of slavery was consummated. A political revolution has occurred, important in itself, but more momentous—shall I say in its portent or in its promise? Which ought to be said depends on how the revolution shall be used: and this element of uncertainty in the new political problem that the elections have presented is the very reason why the most serious thought and the purest ethical principles which the pulpit of America can furnish should be thrown into the cauldron of social forces where the solution is to be determined. That this political revolution is not merely an accidental and transient occurrence, but the effect of causes that are more than local or superficial or temporary, is proved by its wide extent and the thoroughness of its operation. In practical result, indeed, according to a somewhat awkward feature of our institutions, it will show itself at first only in a change of party leadership in the new House of Representatives, not to meet till the 4th of next March or after. But such a change as that in the popular branch of Congress occurring in the middle of a presidential administration, has usually in our national history been the presage of a general change that has followed in the succeeding presidential election.

Yet in this political revolution there is a presage of something more than a mere change of party leadership in the nation, as between the two parties into which the citizens have, for the most part, been divided in recent years. There is in it, I think, a presage of a revolution in parties rather than of a coming general victory of either of the old parties over the other. For who can tell what distinct national party-issue has been involved in these elections? Who can point out a single one of the old party questions that has divided the contestants? It would be a curious study to bring together for comparison the different platforms of political doctrine which have been adopted by the various State conventions of both parties during the past summer and autumn. You could not run a line through them anywhere, following the party names of the conventions, and say these resolutions on this side are exclusively the creed of this party, those on that side are exclusively the creed of that party. Should you attempt to divide the platforms according to the political doctrines enunciated in them, you would be equally sure to fall into confusion, and attribute some platforms to conventions that did not originate anything of the sort. As a matter of fact, the platforms of different parties in different States, of parties that were contesting each other vigorously, might have been exchanged with perfect facility without the change of a phrase. So vice versa in different States, and in States even adjoining, platforms were opposed, though the parties standing upon them were nominally the same. I have heard good Republicans, whose party standing was never questioned, say that the platform of the State Democratic Convention in New York expressed their principles better than any campaign resolutions of their own party that they had seen. And I am sure that there are many voters of the Democratic ticket in Massachusetts last Tuesday, who would utterly repudiate the platforms of the Democratic conventions in some of the Western States, which raised the old cry for an inflated currency and for paying the national debt in paper money. In some of the States the party resolutions looked one way, the party candidates another. There was a little squint of this sort in the Republican party of Massachusetts, whose candidate for the highest office was a most pronounced and vigorous prohibitionist, but whose resolutions on the local question most prominently at issue, the prohibitory law, kept a most notable and emphatic silence.

Now this political revolution discloses so many facts of this kind—facts which show into what confusion the old parties have been thrown, and what little courage they have for taking up new issues, and how extensively the old party lines have been obliterated, and with what facility voters change their party obligations—that it becomes a sign of a political movement vastly deeper and more important than the downfall of the party now in power and the rise of its old antagonist into its place. Fifty thousand voters or more in the State of New York alone have changed from one party to the other in the last two years. Such a fact shows that the independent voter is abroad,—that the people have an instinctive feeling that the old parties have about accomplished their mission, and that under the changed conditions of the country new party divisions and new men are needed. It is a time of political turmoil, unrest, uncertainty, of search somewhat blinded perhaps, and of experiment somewhat hazardous, yet search and experiment after some better state of things,—a time when the elements of the most momentous political problems are thrown together in the crudest confusion; yet therefore it is a time when old political parties are likely to go down to decay, that new parties, on new issues, and with the inspiration of new ideas and new hopes, may come forth from the confusion and the ruin. Hence this election has most important lessons both for the victors and the vanquished. Let us look at some of them.

The first is a lesson for both sides, but especially for the victors. It is contained in the fact just stated, that this victory does not mean by any just right the resuscitation of an old party, but the preparation of the field for new parties. I said at the outset that the popular branch of Congress is now, for the first time since the opening of the war, to pass nominally into the hands of the party under whose sovereignty the war began. But notice that I said nominally; and I chose that word with special design. Nominally, the party is the same. It continued its organization unbroken through the war, through all the period of reconstruction, and has held itself in the form of the same party to this day. But in reality it is a very different party. Its old traditions and principles are gone, though its new have not come. The party that voted for Horace Greeley, its old life-long antagonist, two years ago, is certainly not the same party in substance that voted for James K. Polk and James Buchanan. If this political revolution really betokened the resurrection of the Democratic party as it was when James Buchanan was President, and Floyd and Thompson and Cobb were the leading members of his Cabinet, and Jefferson Davis and Mason and Slidell and Robert Toombs were its leaders in Congress, the victory would indeed be a portent of awful moment to the country,—an omen of coming evil before which the country's credit would shiver in the money markets of the world, business be paralyzed, and national dishonor and ruin stare us in the face. But the issues of that far-off time are dead, and are buried fathoms deep beneath the blood of the war. No political dredging-machine is in existence or can be invented that can bring up to the surface again those issues. No political party, whether under an old name or a new name, can carry the country back to the dark ages of Buchanan and Pierce, of Lecompton constitutions and fugitive slave laws. Political revolutions never go backward, at least so far as that. There are certain things in this world which, when once settled, are settled forever. And among these things we may consider the abolition of slavery in this country, and the admission of the negro to the right of suffrage on the same terms with the white man. Certainly no sane man of the victorious party last Tuesday, though he be of the type of the traditional Pennsylvania backwoodsmen who, it is said, are still voting for Andrew Jackson, thinks for a moment that the constitutional amendment securing the first of these settlements can ever be touched. Possibly a few think that the second amendment, securing the latter, may be,—that in some way the ex-slaves may be deprived of the ballot. But let any party, new or old, make an attempt in that direction, let it avowedly make a party-measure of any kind of suffrage law that should not affect black and white alike, and it would soon discover that it had awakened the sleeping elements of the old war-inspiration, and aroused an antagonist before which, if need be, party lines should again become military lines, and the watchwords of campaigns, whether at the ballot-box or on other fields, should be justice, honor, and equal rights. No; the suffrage amendment, more than the emancipation amendment, will not, I believe, be touched. The party under which the rebellion began cannot be restored: for its best strength through all the North became a loyal partner in overcoming the rebellion. Though you bring back the name, you cannot bring back the thing. And the party that put down the rebellion, though its name and power should now pass away, can never lose its historic renown for that achievement, nor the country be robbed of the grand results of its loyal deeds: for, to all practical intents and purposes, the country was the party, and will be again if those hard-won results are assailed.

And yet, though the national conditions existing before the war cannot be restored, and though no politician, however antediluvian in his partisanship, can be so void of political shrewdness as to attempt to overturn the great constitutional results of the war, the victorious voters in this new revolution are nevertheless in danger of falling into a partial reactionary movement, which will despoil their victory of the best part of its opportunity. The Constitution guaranteeing equal political rights to the negro may remain unchanged, and no active party-measures may be announced curtailing those rights; and yet the negro may be left by a supine national administration, and under the old plea of State rights, to the mercy of a merciless local foe, with none of his rights, theoretically guaranteed, actually secured to him. So there may be possible reaction on financial issues, bringing up the old questions of partial repudiation of the national debt, or inclusion in it of the rebel debt, payment of rebel claims, and indefinite postponement of specie payment, with a wild increase of paper currency. Therefore the victors need to be impressed with the lesson that they should use their victory with a wise moderation. The underlying force of this revolution is not reactionary,—at least, it does not mean any going back to the old condition of things of the kind here described. It is rather a restless reaching out after some settlement of the national troubles that have followed the war which shall be safe, durable, and equitable. The party in power has not brought this settlement; and the people, impatient, and not stopping to consider whether or not their impatience is reasonable, are turning as an experiment elsewhere. But any attempt at settlement that shall go back to revive old issues, any attempt at settlement that shall not redeem the nation's solemn promises to the freedmen, and shall not keep to the full its honor with its creditors, will be surely overtaken by a fresh reaction in the other direction, which will sweep the experimenting party, before it is fairly out of its cradle, into its grave. Let the victors be wise, then, and study well the conditions and significance of their triumph, before they develop their party principles, and organize their party measures.

And on the local issue that was most prominent in our own State—that of the Prohibitory Liquor Law—the triumphant party should heed the same lesson. If wise, they will not enact a weak license law, which will mean practically free rum, and which is sure to be overturned next year by the triumph of the prohibitory party, but they will set themselves to the thoughtful, painstaking labor of framing a law which, while guarding individual rights, shall yet so hedge about and regulate and confine the dangerous liquor traffic, that it shall be seen by all good citizens to be a law really promotive of temperance. The Governor-elect and other leading speakers of the victorious party have professed to be temperance men. It is to be presumed that they are, and that they are sincere in their professions of seeking to promote temperance in the community. They complain of the present law that it does not accomplish this end so effectively as something else would do. Now, then, is their opportunity, and their duty. Let them enact a law on the regulative plan that shall check this vast evil of intemperance, and extinguish the miseries flowing from it to a greater degree than the prohibitory plan does, and they may be assured, however some long-standing, narrow partisans of prohibition might feel, that the people of Massachusetts will let such a law stand. The great end to be reached is the suppression of intemperance. Let the wise and sober-minded and philanthropic men of all parties in the State, without reference to previous party lines, unite their forces for the construction of a statute which, with the least infringement on any legitimate personal liberty, shall best accomplish that much to be desired end. That will be both wise statesmanship and true philanthropy.

But there is an ominous sign which seems to point not strongly to any such consummation. And in this lies another lesson for the victors to take to heart in this State,—as there is a kindred lesson to be learned in the more general triumph in the nation. It is an evil omen when the lowest classes of society—the rum drinkers, the rum sellers, the ignorant, the vicious, the criminal—are rejoicing over a political triumph as they have been the last week in Massachusetts. I do not say that the party that has been victorious is necessarily bad because such people are in it to swell its triumphal processions. Much less do I say that all its members are bad or thoughtless. The victorious party I know, and rejoice to know, has as good men, as earnest-minded men, as thoughtful and able men, as has the party which has held power so long. Nor has it all the rogues and bad men. Perhaps at present it has not so many able bad men as the other party. Yet it is a fact that these lowest classes of society as a mass are rejoicing in its victory; and the fact shows that for some reason or other, whether it be a sufficient reason or not, these classes have the expectation that under the rule of the victorious party there will be more license to animal appetite and immorality. These expectations may happily be disappointed. But it is an ill omen when such expectations are entertained of a victorious party. Not to satisfy them and yet to retain the power which they have helped to bestow is a dilemma between whose horns few political leaders of any party have the skill to pass unscathed. It is plain that the triumphant party will need to summon to the helm all the mental and moral power in its ranks in order to steer successfully between this Scylla and Charybdis.

And a like ominous sign attends the general triumph in the nation. That is not wholly a victory of whose beneficence thoughtful and honest non-partisan citizens can yet feel sure, which brings into power again in New York the Tammany politicians, whose predecessors and brethren a few years ago were driven from office in a storm of indignation by a plundered people. The Tammany politicians to-day may not be thieves and swindlers like Tweed and his compeers, they may not be robbers of the public treasury; but, though better men, it is to be feared they are using essentially the same political methods under which Tweed and his friends fell into dishonest courses, and under which men of the like moral weakness will again fall into temptation and carry their party down to destruction with them. We want a political revolution that shall not merely change parties or office-holders, but shall go down with its reforming, cleansing power to the bottom of political methods, and sweep away the very opportunity for political trickery, log-rolling, intrigue, and the plunder of public funds. And it is a part of the difficulty of the new problem which this election presents to the nation, that, in the revolution which seems to betoken the downfall of the party in power, Tammany politics have again come to the surface, and been lifted into positions of influence; and that it is in the metropolis of New York, under their baleful shadow, that this revolution has its centre, and that there the party of the future is expected to organize for its national work. Again I say, therefore, all the mental and moral ability that the victors can command will be required to enable them successfully to withstand and counteract the corrupting influence of such a partner.

And in this connection it should be said that another point on which the victors are to be on their guard, especially those earnest and independent voters who have helped to win the victory with a view to political reform, is the exceeding danger that the movement may be seized by ambitious and self-seeking politicians, and turned from its legitimate objects to serve their personal advantage. Let the experience of two years ago be remembered, when the political reform that began under such encouraging auspices in the movement for the Cincinnati Convention was taken possession of by political malcontents, and its original purposes utterly thwarted and its moral power annulled by an alliance with those who had no conviction of its principles in their hearts, but were bent only on immediate and personal success. If this revolution is to accomplish anything valuable for American politics, if it is really the beginning of the new party that is to solve the new political issues of the time, let it by all means keep clear of entangling alliances with all men and movements of spotted political reputation in the past. Let it find its leaders in the thick of its own convictions and aims, and not select them because they have been shrewd party managers in other movements and other days.

But it is time to turn to consider some of the lessons which the vanquished should heed,—which may be more briefly done, since upon them does not devolve now so great a portion of political responsibility. Yet it is for them to consider, too, whether the national issues on which they have been organized are not past or fast passing, and whether it is worth while simply to cling to a party for its old name and record, which is powerless in its present organization to take up the new issues, because as a party it has no harmony of conviction upon them. A party cannot continue to live on its old glories when there is a summons to new duties. Nor should a party consider itself defeated when the principles for which it was organized have been absorbed into the life of the nation, and its members then feel themselves free for other political combinations and other work. A party that is great and powerful may survive indeed after this point. It keeps a large class of persons in places of power who are personally interested in its surviving, because their influence and even their material sustenance may depend upon it. But though surviving, it has no moral earnestness, no inspiration, after this period is reached. It moves and acts mechanically, as puppet-moving politicians manipulate the strings. It then becomes an easy prey to corruption and intriguers. I think there have been some signs of late that the Republican party has passed this point,—has passed the point when its continuance can be insured under the principle of "survival of the fittest." There was a time when it was called, and justly, the party of moral ideas. I doubt if it can have justly been so called for the past two years. What great moral ideas has it been unitedly advocating and pressing into execution since the last presidential election? It had in its keeping the Civil Rights Bill, but it failed to pass it. There was a time when it was moved by the inspiration of a grand moral enthusiasm. What grand moral enthusiasm has inspired it in these later years under such active leaders as Morton and Butler? Could it have taken up successfully the problems of finance, could it have restored order in the South, could it have furnished statesmanship for grappling with the new conditions of government which the war entailed upon the country, it would have received a farther lease of power. But it has failed, and the people have written over it, Wanting. Whether any new party will do better, at least immediately, may be doubtful; but the people mean to try the experiment. A party is defeated when its moral convictions die, rather than when its voters leave it to try the fortune of their principles elsewhere. And there are many who voted with the defeated party last Tuesday who yet do not feel defeated, because they see the opportunity at hand in which they may be free for a new political organization, that shall seek the promotion of political convictions which they have now most at heart, but which their old party has declined to take up or endorse. There are certainly thousands of true men in the party which has nominally suffered defeat, who are ready to call the political revolution in which the prince of all political corruptionists and intriguers has gone down in the general overturn, not a defeat, but a victory.

For again the vanquished should take the lesson to their hearts, and the victors heed the same as a warning, that the party in power has been carrying a too heavy burden of corrupt men and corrupt practices. Whatever may be said of the purpose and work of the party in ferreting out corruptions, whether in its own limits or elsewhere—and let all credit be given to it for that work,—it is nevertheless a proved fact that corruptions of various kinds have existed under its administration of power, and the people hold it responsible therefor. It is useless—nay, it is criminal—to try to keep out of sight that among the causes that have produced this political revolution are the Credit Mobilier exposures, the Jayne and Sanborn contracts, the political and financial jobbery in the District of Columbia, the Custom House machinations, the swindling under State governments of the same party name in the South, and the presence in the party, and in places of power in Congress and throughout the country, of men whose garments are smirched with venality and perjury. The old leaders of the party, those who once gave it its moral character and stability, have mostly passed away. They have gone down to their graves, or, escaping from the evil days, have sought or been forced into political retirement. In their place have appeared a set of men whom the war brought to the surface, and who may have done good service in their places in the war, but who in politics are little more than self-seeking adventurers, with weak moral natures, and with no other idea of statesmanship than that it is the doctrine of party expediency and political intrigue. Not all the men, indeed, who were lifted into civil service by the war are of this class. Some of them have done most valuable service in legislation or executive office. Yet of too many will this description hold true. And with them has grown into alarming proportions the reprehensible custom of openly seeking and claiming office as the reward of past party services, or because for any reason one may chance to want it,—while there are even cases of men of admitted incompetence for the office sought, who have yet, it is well known, obtained the nomination of the party for it, through their audacity and their money. Now the election means a revolt of the people against this class of politicians and against the machinations and trickery that have kept them in power,—a revolt against party corruption and party intrigue. This meaning may not be everywhere plain; the voters may not have clearly defined it to themselves; if they had they certainly would have kept certain other men at home whom they have now returned to public office, and the adoption of certain constitutional amendments in New York, designed to protect political purity, would be beyond question; yet within the revolution which the independent action of so many voters has produced there is wrapped, undoubtedly, this significant rebuke of political intrigue and corruption.

But will the new party or parties that shall arise out of this general political confusion and disappearance of old party lines escape these same evils? That will depend more upon the people themselves than upon the politicians. The people in this country can hold the politicians to a high standard of principle and conduct, if they will. Never was there a time more favorable for the formation of a strong and honest political party in this country than at this moment. The opportunity is great, the need is urgent, and the people are awaking to be sensible of the need. This is the best sign in the elections. But it will require clear sight, earnest thought, faithful conscience, and patient, devoted labor, and on the part of the people themselves, to effect the organization that shall supply the need.

May I venture to hint some of the principles of this party of the future?—principles which, though they may not win their way to a large and controlling public confidence at once, are inevitably essential to a durable success, and, as it seems to me, the absolute conditions for solving the pressing problems of the time.

First and foremost, such a party must take its irrevocable stand on the basis of the great amendments to the Constitution which came as the result of the war, not moving a stone or a plank of that foundation; take its stand there, however, not for the sake of keeping alive issues that are past, but because only from that basis, which has become an historic epoch in the progress of mankind, can it efficiently apply itself to the political duties of the present.

Second: From that basis let it cordially invite and welcome to its coöperation all who can honestly stand upon the same foundation, whether they are of the North or South, and irrespective of previous condition of master or slave, Unionist or Confederate.

Third: Let such a party solemnly guarantee that the national honor shall be kept untarnished with all creditors, and that the nation shall pay its honest debts like an honest man.

Fourth: Let it adopt measures for establishing for the country a sound and stable financial policy, and for a return at the earliest possible moment to specie payments.

Fifth: Let it hold the government in all its departments to a rigid honesty in expenditure, and to a not parsimonious but prudent and healthy economy,—setting its face like flint against all political corruption and corruptionists.

Sixth: Let it take up the Civil Service Reform, not simply as a good theory, but with a sincere purpose to put it in practice, as one of the best means of securing competent persons for the public service and of purifying the methods of political action.

Seventh: Let it seek to put men into office whom for their ability and integrity the office needs, rather than those who seek the office for their own needs.

Eighth: Let it check the reckless bestowal of the public lands upon private corporations, and reserve the avails of them for the best benefit of all the people of the country, and especially for the uses of education,—the increase of intelligence among the citizens who are the source of its power being the one internal improvement to which the national government may consistently commit itself.

Ninth: Let it restrain the tendency, which the war naturally developed, to centralization of power in the federal government, and to the administration of power without the direct sanction of law, and at the same time create a national administration strong enough to make itself respected wherever its constitutional authority extends, and able, through the legitimate operation of the laws and courts, to secure to all the inhabitants of the land, of whatever condition or color or creed, their natural and constitutional rights to life, liberty, justice, and equality before the law.

Here, certainly, are principles, definite, important, beneficent, which already command the assent of a large number of thoughtful citizens, and upon which, it would seem, a political party might be rallied in this country that would ere long, if not at once, win success and power. In the present political demoralization there is most urgent need of some such definite and self-consistent statement of political convictions and aims. If neither of the old parties will make it, then a new party must. And if a statement embodying the substance of the principles here sketched should be put forth by a representative body of men, respected for their character and known to mean what they say, I believe a large portion of the American people, in all parts of the land, would be ready to join the new standard. Here are principles that may arouse even an enthusiastic advocacy. Surely, they should win the support of the thoughtful lovers of justice and honesty, of stability, purity, and intelligence in governmental affairs. Especially should they attract the young men and those who may be just entering political life, and have not yet committed themselves to any partisan political policy. It is among the younger men that any new party of the kind here sketched must find its main strength. During the next twenty-five years momentous questions for the weal or woe of our country are to come up for settlement; and the decision will rest mainly with the men who are now young. Let such, especially, prepare themselves well for this responsibility of republican citizenship. By a careful study of present tendencies and opening problems, by thoroughly acquainting themselves with the civil and social experience of mankind in the past, and by cultivating the habit of single-eyed devotion to the country's welfare, may they fit themselves for their duties, whether as private citizens or as public servants. For to be qualified to serve one's country is no mean aspiration. To be merely an office-seeker is contemptible. To use office for taking care of oneself or friends at the expense of the State is criminal. But to fit oneself well to fill an office to which the voluntary suffrages of fellow-citizens may summon one is a worthy ambition.

But who shall be the standard-bearer of such a party? Who shall lead this new crusade for political reform? Let us not be over-anxious and prematurely curious on the question of leadership. Especially let the people who have these principles at heart beware how they begin to put any man in training for the place. When the hour is ripe, the leader will appear. Meantime, let a sacred memory lead us. In this hour of political unrest and confusion there comes inevitably to our minds the remembrance of one, our great and pure Senator, who died last spring at his public post in Washington, and who, in his dying, brought a whole nation, political friends and political foes, the high and the humble, together around his bier in tears of grateful admiration. He, for his devotion to his country before party or self, for his wide knowledge and large experience, for his incorruptible integrity, for his life-long adherence to justice, for his grand pride in the American Republic and his invincible faith in its ideas, if death had spared him, might have been the natural leader for the hour. But his commanding voice is silenced, his hand can no more execute our will. Yet may the memory of his public and private virtues help so to quicken and inspire the mind and conscience of the American people, that the people themselves shall lead the nation to a triumph of purity in all parts of the public service and of right to all classes of citizens.

HEAR BOTH SIDES.

BY CHARLES K. WHIPPLE.

I have for years attended, as a listener and a learner, the prayer-meetings of the Boston Young Men's Christian Association; and I find there a marked discrepancy between what I hear and what I feel.

I hear there frequent declarations (made, evidently, in gratitude to the Giver, and not from personal vanity or vainglory) of a permanent rest, peace, and spiritual delight enjoyed by the narrators, of complete deliverance from the fear of death, and of a faith efficacious to sustain them under those anxieties, troubles, and despondencies which misfortune of any kind tends to produce. Whatever may befall them, poverty or disease, painful accident or pecuniary loss, privation of friends or relatives by death, or their own summons to a speedy departure from this world, these and all other things (they affirm) are made to work together for their good; and so perfect welfare is secured for them both in this life and that which is to come.

Those who claim to have received these benefits ascribe them to their reception (not with the intellect, but with the spiritual and affectional nature) of the doctrines commonly known as "Orthodox" or "Evangelical." Further, they declare with the utmost confidence not only that the joy, rest, and peace in question certainly and appropriately flow from this source, but that they can have no other source; and that, even in those exceptional cases where some other reliance seems to suffice for the exigencies of this life, no other can avail at the approach or in the hour of death.

It is noticeable that the assurance above described is expressed with equal confidence by all classes of those who have adopted the ideas in question. The new convert, whether ignorant or intelligent, and the believer who has scarcely passed the age of childhood, affirm just as confidently as the experienced church-member, both that they are thus saved, and that in no other way can any one be saved. All but those who hold with them are in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity; where (they confess) they also would have remained but for unmerited favor and grace; and they incessantly enjoin upon those who hear them to seize that "way of escape," to accept those "terms of salvation" which have wrought such admirable results in their own case.

As I sit and hear these things repeated thus confidently, I recognize an utter unsoundness and delusion in them, as far as my own case is concerned; since I possess and enjoy, and have for many years possessed and enjoyed, the very advantages thus claimed, but on a ground quite different from that which my "Orthodox" friends claim as the only source capable of producing them. I have permanent peace, rest, and joy in God, genuine, affectionate communion with him, and perfect trust in his friendly providence, not only as guarding my present welfare, but as sure to accomplish my permanent welfare. But I have obtained these invaluable blessings in the manner recommended in the parable of the "Prodigal Son," by direct, personal application to my Father, God, without seeking or desiring the mediation or intercession of an elder brother, or of any third party whatever. When I hear in the prayer-meeting the frequent repetition of the formula, "Give yourself to Jesus," my reflection is—I cannot commit so dishonest an act. I belong to God. I acknowledge his proprietorship in me, and my responsibility to him; and, recognizing him both as Creator and Friend, and being well assured of his presence with me at all times, I conceive that I honor and please him best by such trust in the reality of his Fatherhood as to bring directly to himself such supplication or thanksgiving, or such outpouring of gratitude or affection as I may feel moved at any time to offer.

Thus, between myself and any one of the conductors of this meeting, there exists this very curious relative position: each thinks the other grossly and enormously in error; each regards the other as cherishing delusive hopes and unfounded expectations; each supposes the other to hold erroneous ideas of God, and of the true relation of men to him, and of the present chief business, and the ultimate destiny, of mankind; and each thinks it the immediate duty of the other to change his position.

The last of these points of resemblance between me and my friend of the Association brings me to the mention of a point of difference between us; he wishes me forthwith to accept his doctrine, taking its correctness for granted; I wish him to examine fairly both mine and his own, to see which ought rather to be accepted. I appeal to truth, agreeing to abide by what fair and full investigation shall show to be truth.

The course naturally and reasonably to be taken, in this state of things, is, I think, that my friend and I should sit down together, and calmly look into and compare the ground of our opposite beliefs, that we may be enabled to agree as to what is truth, and as to what duties, what course of life, and what attitude towards God and our fellow-men are thus shown to be obligatory upon us.

But when I propose this, my friend of the Association frankly declares that no consideration whatever will avail to make him give up the theological system held and taught by the Association. He does not care to look at the grounds of my ideas, because "he knows that my ideas are wrong." He does not care to scrutinize the basis of the Association's system, because "he knows that system to be right." When I ask why he receives this or that doctrine, he promptly cites a text. When I show that, from the meaning and connection of that text, it can have no proper bearing upon the subject in question, and show perhaps, also, that he has put into the mouth of Jesus or of Paul words handed down to us as coming from Solomon or David, none of these things move him, except to the avoidance of further conference. When I quote to him, from that Scripture which he claims to be a rule of duty as well as of faith, the injunction: "Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you"—he quietly assumes that I am "carnal" and not "spiritual," and that therefore it would be useless to talk to me. As to the last point, there is this to be said in maintenance of my friend's position: that it is customary with the Association and its members to stigmatize as "carnal" persons holding a theology materially different from their own; and that, at one of their great conventions recently held, members of the Association were expressly advised "not to argue" with such persons.

Private friendly conference upon these matters being thus out of the question, it may be asked: Why not, in a meeting advertised as "Free," and where the leader habitually invites, and even urges, everybody to speak who has anything to say, why not make a quiet, brief statement of varying views and the reasons of them, that each person present may compare them at leisure with those taught by the Association?

This course, which would seem natural and probable in a meeting called "Free," is very rarely attempted by any dissenter from the ideas there dominant, because the policy and customs of the Association are well known to be hostile to it. I myself have known of three cases in which dissenters have been imperatively desired by those in authority not to speak again; of two or three cases in which the expression of unwelcome opinion has been clamored down, the leader of the meeting interrupting the speaker by starting the doxology to indicate that the session was closed, and that in advance of the customary time of closing, and I have known of two cases in which manual force was used by those in authority to prevent such dissenters from taking such part in the meetings as all those present had been expressly desired to take.

Is it asked—even supposing the correctness of the above representations—why speak of them? Why not let the managers of the institution in question manage it in their own way?

My reasons for speaking thus openly (after the failure, be it observed, of attempts to present these thoughts to the Association itself, in its meetings for religious conference, and to individual members of it in private) are the following:—

Having long been conversant with the reasons (of all kinds) for and against the theological system on which the Association in question is founded, I am sure that very much of what is claimed in regard to it is unsound and untrue, and that this could be plainly shown if comparison of views were permitted there.

Most of the young men who are brought into these meetings by the zealous street-missionaries of the Association plainly belong to the class called uncultivated, or ignorant. They have no comprehension of the nature of evidence, or of the conditions which ought properly to precede a man's belief in any statement. They are predisposed to look upon the missionaries who have gathered them, and upon the managers of the Association who patronize them, as both good and wise; and they readily receive as true any proposition uttered with solemnity by any of these persons. The "converts" made from this class—and it is this class which furnishes far the larger proportion of converts—remain ignorant, being expressly taught by the leaders, as well as by the general tone of the meetings in question, that what they need to know is "Jesus, and Jesus only." They are taught that it is their clear and imperative duty to speak in these meetings, from the moment they have "given themselves to Jesus," and they are very soon urged to take the leadership in them; and, whether as leaders, or as simple exhorters, they are conspicuous examples of "zeal without knowledge." The good influence exercised by the Association in keeping these young men from the use of strong drink, tobacco, and profane language is largely counterbalanced by the arrest of mental development which the training there clearly tends to produce. Not only are certain theologic dogmas imposed on them as necessary to be received and believed without examination, but the influence of the institution leaves them (in the majority of cases) as it found them, without knowing how to examine anything, even without knowing that scrutiny should precede assent.

I affirm, after careful and long continued observation, that most of the "converts" made in these prayer-meetings are of the sort above described. But the claim of the Association that many converts are made is the chief ground on which it annually asks the contribution of thousands of dollars for salaries and material aids for propagandism. As the Association represents the good thus effected as immense, and as the incidental works of beneficence employed to facilitate this propagandism are so trumpeted as to persuade many people to give it money who would refuse to do so if they understood its partisan and exclusive character, it seems fair that, somewhere, a just statement of this character should appear. As the Christian Union is read by the very people who, supporting the Association, ought to understand the matters above stated in regard to it, I ask for this communication a place in its columns.

GENTILES AND HEBREWS.

FRATERNIZATION OF THE INDEPENDENT CHURCH, REV. MR. MUNDY, PASTOR, AND THE SOCIETY OF CONCORD, REV. DR. COHEN, PASTOR.

A very unusual fraternization among religious bodies took place Saturday and Sunday. As is well known, Saturday is the Jewish Sabbath, and is so observed by the congregation of Rabbi Cohen, or Rev. Dr. Cohen as he is usually known outside his own church. In the forenoon of that day, Rev. Mr. Mundy, of the Independent Church, responded to an invitation most cordially given by the Rabbi and church officers, to deliver a discourse in the Synagogue, in Mulberry Street. The services commenced at nine o'clock, and at that hour a goodly number of people, mostly from Dr. Cohen's congregation, had assembled. Rev. Mr. Mundy sat inside the altar beside the church reader. The usual services, including the reading of the Scriptures from the manuscript roll, were conducted by Rev. Dr. Cohen; there were responsive services also by the priest and the very fine choir.

Then came the discourse by Rev. Mr. Mundy; it was a plea for Christian unity on the great basis of a common brotherhood in the spirit of God. "Brethren and friends," were the first words of the preacher. "It is with mingled feelings of pain and pleasure that I stand before you." Mr. Mundy affirmed that he was grateful for the invitation of the Rabbi and officers of the congregation; this gave him much pleasure; but as he stood there he could but recall the long past; he could but think of how the blood of the children of Israel stained the garments of the Christian Church. Protestants had suffered much from Catholics, but the Jews had suffered far more. The Hebrews brought knowledge, and experience, and wealth into Europe, and of the latter we robbed them. After all this wicked treatment, they had invited him, a Christian, into their sacred place, to speak to them. He was glad to say that we, as Christians, had learned something from them; we thank the Jews for the history they have transmitted, and for this opening of their temple. All religions had their uses; none were wholly good and none were entirely bad; these were suited to the habits of those who used them. But it had been the habit of some to claim that they only had the right way; this was true of Mohammedans, and Hebrews, and Gentiles. Out of this idea had come wars; had come ignorance and barbarism. Now he hoped that all had learned that we had one God, the father, and that we are all brethren; that we were bound together by a oneness of interest. We may call ourselves Jews and Christians, and pull apart as far as we may; and yet are we bound together. So it was in religion; we were indebted to the Mohammedan, to the Egyptian, and to others, and are now eating the fruits they planted. It was time for us to recognize the brotherhood of religions, to do justly and love mercy and walk humbly with God, and thus be his children. His belief and worship was indeed different from theirs, and yet why should this separate them? They had the same God and were seeking the same height of goodness, only by different means. The true Church of God was not Jewish or Christian; it contained all good men, belong they to what sect or church they will. All who have the good spirit of God belong to the brotherhood of the spirit. It was a most ancient organization; it broke down the barriers by which men were separated; it was found in the breast of the Buddhist and the Mohammedan, as well as in that of the Christian. The great leaders, Confucius and Mohammed and Moses and Jesus, were but a cluster of brothers. Let us come out upon the tower of the thought raised by the prophet: We have all one father, and God has created us all.

REV. DR. COHEN AT REV. MR. MUNDY'S CHURCH.

The announcement in the papers, Saturday, that Rev. Dr. Cohen would preach in the Independent Church yesterday forenoon caused that place of worship to be filled to overflowing. The preliminary services were conducted by Rev. Mr. Mundy, and were of the usual character. Rev. Dr. Cohen commenced his discourse with expressions of adoration to God, of thankfulness for the opportunity to exemplify the command: "Love thy neighbor as thyself." He would take for his text the same words chosen by Mr. Mundy, and found in Malachi: "Have we not all one father? hath not one God created us?"

The ills to which human life is heir were noted, and they were cited as incentives for love to our neighbors. The existence of God was shown from the fact that we have created things which imply the existence of a Creator. This was my, your, and our God. The speaker then said he had been invited to give his views of Jesus Christ. They did recognize the existence of a historical personage named Jesus of Nazareth, born in the year 3761. He was a good, high, and excellent scholar and philosopher; when he had grown to manhood he became a great Rabbi and teacher, and was finally crucified. But this act was repeated in history; for example, John Huss was burned in 1415, July 6; and why? He had done no wrong; he was only a reformer, put to death because the Pharisees and Sadducees of his time saw he was destroying their power. Martin Luther was another example. The Pharisees were not all dead yet either; they were still carrying on the work. But, they would say, Jesus was the Son of God. Well, in the name of God, who said he was not? Not the Jews certainly, for they did recognize Christ as the Son of God, as a Rabbi, as a man of high culture, as a reformer. God had called all men his sons, and in this sense only was Christ his son. The reformed Jews did not believe a Messiah had come. They held, and prayed, and worked for the redemption of mankind through the supreme power of love; and this was the Messiah, this was God. Our whole life, through good works, should be a preparation to meet God. We can all enter that heaven of which Abraham spoke, by heeding the injunction in the words, "Behold how good and pleasant a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." The grave will serve as the grand parent of all reunion. True religion caused no strife and separation; it incited to brotherly love and to obedience of the command, "Love thy neighbor as thyself;" for has not one God created us all?—*Syracuse (N. Y.) CALL FOR A CONVENTION.

The people of the United States are awakening to the fact that the national Constitution is destitute of any explicit acknowledgment of God or the Christian religion. Although it is the fundamental law of a great Christian people, its want of a distinct Christian character has led many eminent Christian men to admit that it would need no change to adapt it to a Mohammedan nation.

Thus, many of the friends as well as the foes of Christianity are pointing out a strange inconsistency. While it is an indisputable fact that our government is, and always has been, administered in connection with the Christian religion; that many of its laws, customs, and institutions are distinctively Christian, it is yet maintained on the one side, and admitted on the other, that the Constitution, with which all our laws and institutions should accord, is no more Christian than Mohammedan.

This inconsistency, long a matter of deep regret to many of our best citizens, is now cause of alarm. It is being used persistently, and in many instances successfully, against the Christian institutions of our nation. It is made the basis of the most dangerous assaults on the use of the Bible in the common schools, the oath, Sabbath laws, public fasts and thanksgivings, prayers in Congress and State Legislatures, and all other similar features of our national life.

And now the momentous issue is before us as American citizens: How shall we harmonize the inconsistency? Shall we prove faithless to the inheritance bequeathed to us by Christian fathers, and permit our best institutions to be overthrown on the ground that they are opposed to the Constitution? Are these times of political corruption, financial disaster, pestilence, and want times for us, as a nation, to depart farther from God? Shall we not rather, faithful to our trust as Christian citizens, and realizing our dependence on Divine strength and wisdom, harmonize whatever may be inconsistent in the Constitution and government by a reverent acknowledgment in both of Almighty God and his revealed Will?

A National Association has been formed to secure such an amendment to the Constitution as will suitably acknowledge Almighty God as the Author of the nation's existence, and the ultimate Source of its authority, Jesus Christ as its Ruler, and the Bible as the supreme rule of its conduct; and thus indicate that this is a Christian nation, and place all Christian laws, institutions, and usages on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land. Co-operating with this Association, we, whose names are undersigned, invite our fellow-citizens of New England and neighboring States, who favor such an amendment, without distinction of party or creed, to meet in Tremont Temple, Boston, on Wednesday, December 16, 1874, at 7 1-2 o'clock P.M.

All such citizens, to whose notice this call may be brought, are requested to hold meetings, and appoint delegates to the Convention.

THE NEW SCRIPTURES.

ACCORDING TO DARWIN, TYNDALL, HUXLEY, AND SPENCER.

GENESIS: CHAPTER II.

1. Primarily the Unknowable moved upon cosmos and evolved protoplasm.
2. And protoplasm was inorganic and undifferentiated, containing all things in potential energy; and a spirit of evolution moved upon the fluid mass.
3. And the Unknowable said, Let atoms attract; and their contact begat light, heat, and electricity.
4. And the Unconditioned differentiated the atoms, each after its kind; and their combinations begat rock, air, and water.
5. And there went out a spirit of evolution from the Unconditioned, and working in protoplasm, by accretion and absorption, produced the organic cell.
6. And cell by nutrition evolved primordial germ, and germ developed protogene, and protogene begat eozoon, and eozoon begat monad, and monad begat animalcule.
7. And animalcule begat ephemera; then began creeping things to multiply on the face of the earth.
8. And earthy atom in vegetable protoplasm begat the molecule, and thence came all grass and every herb in the earth.
9. And animalcule in the water evolved fins, tails, claws, and scales; and in the air wings and beaks; and on the land they sprouted such organs as were necessary as played upon by the environment.
10. And by accretion and absorption came the radiata and mollusca; and mollusca begat articulata, and articulata begat vertebrata.
11. Now these are the generation of the higher vertebrata, in the cosmic period that the Unknowable evoluted the bipedal mammalia.
12. And every man of the earth, while he was yet a monkey, and the horse while he was a hipparion, and the hipparion before he was an oredon.
13. Out of the ascidian came the amphibian, and begat the pentadactyle; and the pentadactyle by inheritance and selection produced the hylobate, from which are the simiadæ in all their tribes.
14. And out of the simiadæ the lemur prevailed above his fellows, and produced the platyrhine monkey.
15. And the platyrhine begat the catarrhine, and the catarrhine monkey begat the anthropoid ape, and the ape begat the longimanous orang, and the orang begat the chimpanzee, and the chimpanzee evoluted the what-is-it.
16. And the what-is-it went into the land of Nod and took him a wife of the longimanous gibbons.
17. And in process of the cosmic period were born unto them and their children the anthropomorphic primordial types.
18. The homunculus, the prognathus, the troglodyte, the autochthon, the terragen—these are the generations of primeval man.
19. And primeval man was naked and not ashamed, but lived in quadrumanaus innocence, and struggled mightily to harmonize with the environment.
20. And by inheritance and natural selection did he progress from the stable and homogeneous to the complex and heretogeneous—for the weakest died and the strongest grew and multiplied.
21. And man grew a thumb for that he had need of it, and developed capacities for prey.
22. For, behold, the swiftest men caught the most animals, and the swiftest animals got away from the most men; wherefore the slow animals were eaten and the slow men starved to death.
23. And as types were differentiated the weaker types continually disappeared.
24. And the earth was filled with violence; for man strove with man, and tribe with tribe, whereby they killed off the weak and foolish and secured the survival of the fittest.—Cincinnati Commercial.

The Dean of Westminster is not subject to the control of any bishop. And this is why. When the first Dean was to be ordained over the Abbey, the Bishop of London had ordered all necessary arrangements to be made for the purpose. This was done, and a large number of ecclesiastics had assembled to witness the ceremony. But on the night before the day appointed, the keeper of the Abbey heard a voice calling him from the Surrey side of the river. He went over in a boat, and found there no less a personage than Saint Peter himself, who was accompanied by one or two eminent saints. Saint Peter said he had determined to ordain a Dean for Westminster himself, and the distinguished party being rowed over in the boat had the expectant Dean waked up at midnight and brought to the Abbey. At that hour, while all London was asleep, Saint Peter ordained the first Dean of Westminster, and when the Bishop of London came in state next day to perform the ceremony, he found it all over, unquestionable evidence and certificates of the same having been left. The consequence is that Dean Stanley is responsible to Saint Peter alone, and is, indeed, a Vicar-General of that saint in his own little Vatican on the Thames.—Golden Age.

The Daily News has a sweet, condescending article on Dr. Isaac Watts, à propos of the celebration at Southampton of the bicentenary of his birth; an article which is as a parcel of lollypops held out to the innocent babes of Dissent, who ought to feel very grateful indeed. With that astonishing faculty for discovering historical parallels, which is developed in journalists who want at once to fill up a few lines and show that they have read something, the writer says: "John Bunyan sold boot-laces when in gaol for his religious opinions; the mother of Isaac Watts sat on a stone at the gate of the prison where her husband was lodged, and held the future divine and hymn-writer, then an infant, at her breast." Our editor has munificently promised a copy of the final number of the ever-to-be-continued National Reformer to any one who shall satisfactorily answer this riddle: Why was John Bunyan inside a prison selling boot-laces like Mrs. Watts outside a prison nursing her baby? I have space to mention but one other remark of the Daily News man. He says that Dr. Watt's hymns are the delight of children.—National Reformer.

A QUESTION.

BY M. B. S.

Whence cometh this restless yearning,
This fever of heart and brain,
This eager, unsatisfied longing,
That bringeth us only pain?

A memory of that country
Where our spirits had their birth?
Or, is it a premonition
Of something better than earth?

And will our toilsome endeavor,
And our weary craving cease,
When Death, o'er the tired sleeper,
Whispers the benison—peace!

We close with lingering kisses
The eyelids cold of our dead;
Not for weeping or caressing
Have they any answer made.

Is Death, then, the only healer
We mortals can ever know?
If Life hath no other fulfilment
How shall we have time to grow?

Nay, Heart! thy unquenchable longing
Itself a sweet answer gives,
That God, our eternal Father,
In His boundless Universe lives!

We shall, in the coming future,
Hope's fullest fruition reach;
That blest, diviner perfection
We cannot put into speech.

A larger, completer existence
To our weary quest be given;
But oh, for a word, through the silence,
Assuring our hearts of Heaven!

POSTAGE NOTICE.

The new Postal Law which goes into effect at New Year will require prepayment of postage on The Index by the publishers, thus releasing the subscribers from the necessity of paying their own postage to the government. In consequence of this change, an additional expense of several hundred dollars a year will be entailed on the Index Association; to meet which it is necessary to ask our subscribers to remit Twenty Cents apiece by the first of January. This sum, if paid in advance, has been hitherto charged to each of them by the Post Office Department, and no new expense is entailed upon them by remitting the same amount in advance to the Index Association. The burden will be a heavy one to the Association, if borne by it alone; but it will be insignificant, if distributed equally among the subscribers. We are confident they will not wish the Association to pay these trifling charges in their stead, when they see that the aggregate of them is so serious a matter. Those of our subscribers who have already renewed their subscriptions will oblige us by remitting the twenty cents without waiting till their terms expire; while those who are about to renew will doubtless cheerfully add the small amount above named. A large "P" on their mail-tags will be our receipt for it.

"Give us 'honest' lists of our ministers and of our societies too!" This is the unwelcome cry that begins to greet the ears of the Year Book compilers. Nothing but shrewd and sectarian diplomacy will evade it. If either of those lists contains doubtful names, strike them off! It is the turn of the Christian Register now to practise a little "modern martyrdom"—to swallow the same pill it has just administered to others. We request it to say "yes" or "no" to this question: does not honesty require to make one list just as honest as the other? To catechize all the ministers and all the societies would doubtless shorten those lists not a little; we admit it. But honesty now demands this sacrifice, and we quote to the Register this advice of its own, which it "freely offered" to the radicals so recently, and which it may now apply to its own case: "They should make known their precise position, and bravely take the far from terrible temporal consequences. There is nothing in the situation to make a manly man whimper, or to excite the painful sympathy of any of his friends. The same great law of duty applies to Christians, Jews, Mohammedans, and Free Religionists: if you are in a true position, stand fast; if you are sailing under false colors, the sooner you hoist your true flag the better. The inward satisfaction which attends a sincere course is so great, that outward gains or losses scarcely deserve mention." If the American Unitarian Association were sincere in what they said last winter about the Year Book, they will not flinch this winter to stick to it and give two honest lists to the denomination, despite all "outward gains or losses;" and if the Register is sincere in what it tells the radicals above, it will tell the same things now to its friends.

ANTI-CHRISTIANITY.

"What do you mean by taking an 'anti-Christian position'? Do you suppose that you can destroy Christianity before its time, or that the world would be the gainer if you could? Do you not believe in the law of evolution, and recognize the impossibility of violently doing away with any institution that is still rooted in the hearts and minds of men? Do you not think it harsh and unjust to cherish a hostile feeling towards Jesus, one of the sweetest spirits of all time, and towards the great body of good and true people who still behold in him their Divine Teacher, Lord, and God? In short, why is it not bitter, bigoted, fanatical, unjust, and unreasonable to oppose Christianity, instead of seeking to aid its development into the higher truth of thought, feeling, and action which you call Free Religion?"

Such are some of the questions which have risen in the minds of some of our readers; and it is the purpose of this article to give the fairest possible answer to them.

1. In the first place, he occupies an "anti-Christian position" who perceives the obstructiveness of the Christian religion as a whole (including both its mythology and its ecclesiasticism, its principle of authority, its assumption of control over individual, social, and political life, and its general influence on history and civilization) to the natural and free evolution of human society in all its various aspects,—who feels the obligation imposed upon him by this perception, and endeavors faithfully to discharge the public and private duties which it involves. Virtually, if not nominally, every person is an anti-Christian who contributes anything towards those general influences by which the world is gradually educating out of Christianity into Free Religion; he may be unconscious of the fact, or even vehemently deny it, yet the fact is not thereby altered in the least. He, however, is the consistent anti-Christian who is fully conscious of the truth that Christianity is dying as an historical religion, and who assists in every right way the growth and spread of those great modern ideas and movements which are the real cause of its death. This is what we mean by taking an "anti-Christian position."

2. Nothing is further from the true anti-Christian's wish than to destroy Christianity before its time, or to destroy it at all in any way except by promoting the growth of the Free Religion which is supplanting it. The world would not be the gainer by any interference with natural processes, among which assassination is by no means to be classed. But the attempt to replace falsehoods and errors by truths, and to conform all political, social, and individual conditions to the requirements of science and universal liberty, is not a destructive but constructive one, if viewed from the stand-point of human welfare; although it is strictly true that the success of this attempt in any high degree involves the disappearance of Christianity from the stage, and is therefore destructive if viewed from the stand-point of the Church.

3. The anti-Christian alone can believe in the law of evolution; for the doctrine of evolution is the chief of those truths which are to-day proving totally and irresistibly destructive to Christianity. He is the first to recognize the impossibility of destroying by violence any institution which is still rooted in human needs; but he also recognizes the necessity of helping mankind to outgrow its transient needs, when that which now feeds them is so rapidly perishing. He never works by violence at all; he uses no weapons but those of superior knowledge and deeper insight into the permanent needs of man; he labors only to make known the truth to all, being confident that truth cannot be discovered any faster than man can adapt himself to it. He understands that the law of evolution is supplemented by the law of dissolution; that no organism can live forever; that evolution requires, not the eternal perpetuation of each individual organism, but the gradual improvement of successive organisms. Hence he knows that the Church, being an organism, cannot survive forever, and discerns the fact that its days are even now drawing to an end; and he works all the more actively to foster the purely humanitarian institutions which must inevitably succeed it. To suppose that Christianity or its institutions can ever adapt themselves to the ideas on which modern civilization is building itself up is, as he clearly perceives, just as irrational as to suppose that a worn-out horse can be transformed into a lively and vigorous colt. He sees the intrinsic absurdity of imagining that Christianity or its Church can ever shift or change or invert the ideas on which it was originally established; and therefore he would persuade mankind to remove into better quarters before it tumbles in ruins about their heads. That Christianity can ever develop into rationalism, or science, or civilization, or "Cosmic Philosophy," is the fond dream of those who bury their eyes in order to avoid seeing. The anti-Christian does but gaze steadfastly at facts; and he knows that the law of evolution forbids the hope of alchemizing Christianity into its opposite. A new religion, with its appropriate institutions, is silently and unperceived growing up all about us; and he cheerfully turns to this new faith as sure to inherit all of real good that the old had to transmit.

4. Of all men, the true anti-Christian is the least likely to cherish a spiteful or bitter spirit towards Jesus. Those who are resolved to adapt Christianity to the modern world on the assumption that it is in some vague sense divine, and therefore get inextricably perplexed in the attempt to construe it as conformable with civilization and science, might be excused, if, like some "Radical Christians," they should sometimes fall into petulance and harshness towards Jesus; for many of the ideas he puts forward (e. g. his own Messiahship and second coming, the Day of Judgment, and so forth) obstinately refuse to be coördinated with the ideas of civilized communities. But the anti-Christian who holds the evolutional philosophy sees in these obsolete ideas the necessary product of past historical conditions, and simply neglects them in estimating the native greatness of Jesus. So far as Christianity as a system is concerned, they are all-important, constituting as they do the germ-thoughts of its historic growth and the specific peculiarities which distinguish it from other religions; but so far as the personal Jesus is concerned, they do not express him, but rather his age. It is the words and acts which are least likely to be the effects of his age and immediate surroundings, that give the only evidence we have as to his personal character; and it is precisely these which make up the most beautiful and intrinsically valuable parts of the gospels. Hence the anti-Christian, bent on rendering historic justice to individuals at the same time that he seeks to replace the Christian system by a philosophy of life better adapted to modern requirements, is under no temptation to cherish a hostile feeling to Jesus, but rather to recognize with admiration and delight all the loveliness and sweetness of his spirit. John Stuart Mill was an anti-Christian in a large sense of the word, though exceedingly cautious and guarded in expressing his opinions on the subject; yet it would be difficult to find a more emphatic or generous eulogium on the character of Jesus than that which is contained in his just published Three Essays on Religion [pages 253–255], and which we republished in last week's Index. It is the system, not the man, that the anti-Christian opposes; and while he may justly detest the one on account of its cruelty in the past and its implacable warfare on science, intelligence, and freedom in the past and the present, he may yet revere and love the other on account of his sweet humanity.

5. Just as little will the anti-Christian who can discriminate between systems and men cherish a hostile feeling towards Christians, individually or in the mass. His anti-Christianity rests on thought, not on feeling; on deliberate convictions and insight into the workings of ecclesiasticism as a factor of social and political development, not at all on blind rage against those who happen to differ from himself in opinion. He refuses to take any party-label or certificate of church-membership as a proof of good character; he insists on his right to judge men's characters independently according to the traits they manifest; he loves those who are lovable, honors those who are honorable, and would scorn to be biased in his estimate of individuals by any speculative beliefs they might hold in religion, politics, or philosophy. The modern form of anti-Christianity, at least, is neither spite, detraction, malevolence, churlishness, nor combativeness; it is simply a thorough comprehension of the highest interests of mankind, a profound sense of obligation to promote them, and an active devotion in serving them to the best of individual self-ability and opportunity. It would be well for the churches, if they comprehended in turn the high-mindedness and uncompromising loyalty to truth which they are enlisting increasingly against themselves.

6. The belief that Christianity is capable of developing gradually into Free Religion, by simply following out more thoroughly its own inherent law, has been expressed by Mr. John Fiske in the concluding chapter of his recent Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy. "Religious progress in the future," he says, "is possible only through the gradual evolution of Christianity itself into higher and higher forms." In accordance with this confused conception of what Christianity is, he says: "With regard to its practical bearings upon human conduct, the religious attitude of our scientific philosophy seems to be absolutely identical with the religious attitude of Christianity. . . . We still regard Christianity as, in the deepest sense, our own religion. . . . We identify our own position with that which is held by Christianity." He therefore "refuses to attack Christianity." Yet his book, from beginning to end, is one of the sharpest attacks it has been called to endure for many a long day. He is so conscious of this that he admits "it may seem absurd or sophistical in us to assimilate with Christianity a system of thought which has entirely thrown off the mythologic symbols wherein Christianity has hitherto been clothed, and whereby it is customarily recognized as possessing an individuality of its own." To justify his astonishing claim of being essentially Christian, he argues that "a sudden and radical alteration of Christianity into something else is as impossible as the sudden and radical change of one type of organism into another;" that, "while form after form has perished, the Life remains, incarnated in newer and higher forms;" and that what "is fundamental in Christianity" is simply the "recognition of Deity" and the "yearning for closer union with Deity." Mr. Fiske might as well argue that he is his own great-great-grandfather, on the ground that Life in general remains, though the form has passed away. He strips from Christianity its clothes, skin, flesh, and bones, and, finding that Existence in the abstract survives, thinks that he still retains Christianity itself. His argument is this: "Cosmism" recognizes God; Christianity recognizes God; therefore, "Cosmism" is Christianity. By the same logic: Mr. Fiske believes in "Cosmism;" Herbert Spencer believes in "Cosmism;" therefore, Mr. Fiske is Herbert Spencer, and wrote the First Principles! Into such sins against logic and good sense is any thinker driven who holds that Christianity is able to "develop" into the modern philosophy which denies every one of its distinctive doctrines. We take the ground that whoever discards these doctrines is an anti-Christian and nothing else, no matter how vehemently he may claim the Christian name, and no matter how superciliously he may look down on the "radical infidelity of the age." It is the instinct of every true soldier who may feel called upon to change his allegiance to abandon his old uniform when he leaves his old army, and not enter the hostile camp in the garb of a deserter.

7. In truth, the whole current of modern thought and life is directly against the faith and institutions of Christianity. Dr. Draper, referring in the preface of his new work to "a great and rapidly increasing departure from the public religious faith," says with great force: "So widespread and so powerful is this secession, that it can neither be treated with contempt nor with punishment. It cannot be extinguished by derision, by vituperation, or by force. The time is rapidly approaching when it will give rise to serious political results." Again (page 364) he declares: "Whatever may be the preparatory incidents of that great impending intellectual crisis which Christendom must soon inevitably witness, of this we may rest assured, that the silent secession from the public faith which in so ominous a manner characterizes the present generation will find at length political expression." This is what we have been saying for six years and more, with greater definiteness still; for we believe that the "political expression" will be a great political struggle for the expansion or retrenchment of religious liberty. It befits every good citizen to study well his own part in those great events. Do you believe in the venerable pillar-doctrines of the Christian religion? If you do, you are a Christian. If you do not, you are an anti-Christian—to the extent that you put your belief into practice. But the becoming spirit of the anti-Christian is high, noble, earnest, self-sacrificing, gentle to all men, free from spite or malice, yet resolute to stand by his convictions and the cause of freedom to the bitter end, not sparing his own reputation or comfort, but resolved to play a man's part in the world without dissimulation and without reserve. It is not the spirit of contempt or bitterness or brawling, but the spirit which scorns to shirk a little labor for man's sake or shun a little obloquy for truth's sake. The one great issue of the Western world for many a long year to come is—Christianity or Free Religion: which? For both, you cannot stand in fact, dream what you may; it is an issue which divides. Are you a Christian, or an anti-Christian?

NEW ENGLAND HOSPITAL FOR WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

The ladies who conducted so successfully the fair in aid of this Hospital, at Mrs. Charles G. Loring's house, a few weeks ago, will hold a supplementary sale at the New England Woman's Club Rooms, No. 3 Tremont Place, on the sixteenth and seventeenth of December.

Many good articles were left unsold at the former fair, and new ones have been received since. The beautiful Southern grasses which were all sold within two hours after the opening of the fair will be replaced by fresh ones from the South, and ferns, Christmas wreaths, and so forth, will be ready for sale. The Fayal pottery which arrived just too late for the fair will be for sale at this time, with many other beautiful articles especially suited for Christmas presents.

As this Hospital is as broad in its charity as the human race, welcoming to its benefits those of every nation, sect, or party, we hope that lovers of freedom and medical education for women will feel an interest in aiding its managers in their arduous labors. They expect to support it by work. E. D. C.

"THE JOURNAL OF SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY."

The October number of Mr. Harris' Journal of Speculative Philosophy contains matter of unusual interest. Almost every reader will turn his attention at once to the review of Professor Tyndall's Belfast address by Thomas Davidson, with the expectation of finding a more unprejudiced analysis of this interesting paper than from the sectarian or secular papers. Mr. Davidson, however, attacks Mr. Tyndall's address upon quite different grounds from those taken by the press generally, not "discussing its bearing upon religion and existing institutions, or its tendency generally, but confining himself to questions of historic fact and undeniable philosophic truth." (In parenthesis, we are glad to hear that there are any truths of this latter order; for we thought it possible to deny anything in these latter days, from the law of gravitation to Christopher Columbus.)

Mr. Davidson then elaborately exposes various blunders of Professor Tyndall, and sums up his estimate pretty severely by saying: "But, if he is a mere tyro in the external history of philosophy, he is something worse in philosophy itself." But after this severe attack upon Professor Tyndall's accuracy and scholarship, he does him justice in the concluding paragraph, where he says: "While, therefore, I entirely sympathize with Professor Tyndall in his manly and determined opposition to dogma and authority, and in his demand for the free and unprejudiced discussion of all questions, I cannot but be sorry that he has diminished the weight of his own authority, and thus injured a cause which is that of all earnest truth-seekers, by trying to draw conclusions in regions of thought where he is an entire stranger, and by being thus entrapped into making a display of carelessness in regard to matters of fact, and of incapacity to grasp philosophic truth."

In a supplementary note, the editor (Mr. Harris) carries his criticism still farther, applying it to other thinkers of the modern school, and closes with this comprehensive sentence: "The stand-point of absolute personality, as the highest principle, is the one to be attained. On this plane, freedom, immortality, and God are the regulative principles of science as well as of life, and they are not only matters of faith, but equally matters of indubitable scientific certainty." He then pays THE INDEX the high compliment of inserting a long passage from Mr. Abbot's remarks on the same address. While we cheerfully acknowledge the right of the group of thoughtful men who conduct this journal to write for themselves, and others as well-instructed in metaphysics, we wish that some mediator could be found who could express their conclusions at least, if not their methods, in simpler language and with greater fulness of illustration; so that those who have unfortunately been deprived of the benefits of severe metaphysical study could gather greater benefit from these earnest and bold thinkers.

Another curious and interesting paper of quite a different character is the translation of Dionysius Thrax. We are tempted to envy the children of the Roman Empire under Pompey the Great so simple and brief a text-book, in comparison with the elaborate grammars of our own day. E. D. C.

THE HEROISM OF LIVING.

No task so hard is set for mortal man as simply living this daily life well and satisfactorily. The great multitude of folk never find this out; but a few do.

Patrick and Bridget, if they can but get enough to fill their bellies and cover their backs, are satisfied, and find life on the whole a pretty comfortable thing. They suffer some, it is true. They are sometimes cold, and sometimes hungry, and sometimes they ache a little. But their sufferings are almost wholly physical, and of the easiest kind to bear. They live from day to day, and from hand to mouth; and their hopes and ambitions and aspirations seldom rise above material things, and seldom these are unsatisfied long. Their very religion is suited to their material necessities; and its comforts, so easily procured from the nearest priest, are as tangible, palpable, and real as the potatoes in the pot, the ham in the frying-pan, or the whiskey in the jug. In ninety cases out of a hundred, they live and die without realizing that life is such a very serious affair after all, and drop into their graves pretty well content with what they have got, and with the way they have fared.

And the same is largely true of the mass of people. The sufferings endured by the common run of mankind are largely overstated in quality,—probably not in quantity. But it is the quality of suffering, rather than the quantity, wherein consists the hardness to bear. If animals really suffer in essential poignancy all that we lookers-on are apt to attribute to them, then all those of us who are meat-eaters would be loaded down with a burden of guilt from which we might hope never to recover. Such of mankind as are more animal than spiritual in all their instincts, desires, and passions,—in whom the mind is much less developed than the body,—though they often suffer to an extent which justly demands our sympathy, and excites our efforts to alleviation, are nevertheless far more saved from that exquisiteness of suffering which afflicts all spiritually and mentally sensitive persons. The quality if not the quantity of one's sufferings depends mainly upon the nature of one's wants and hopes and aspirations. The man who simply wants his dinner, and cannot get it, suffers but slightly in comparison with him or her who wants love and sympathy, and is denied them. In the one case it is a stomach-ache; in the other it is a heart-ache. In the one case it is a ventral unsatisfaction; in the other it is a soul disappointment. All those whose longings rise little above the ordinary benefits of life, whose endeavors are chiefly aimed at the securing mere material possessions, and whose religious natures are satisfied with the ordinary pabulum of the Church cuisine, and with robust promises of not immaterial joys in heaven,—all such generally escape the keenest pangs and obtain the nearest delights, and pass on to the end without much discerning that life is heroic, or that it is greatly touched with tragedy and pathos.

But in proportion as men and women become refined, cultivated, and spiritualized; in proportion as they become poetic, imaginative, and aspiring; in proportion as they lift their hopes and elevate their aims, and strive with all their powers to live, not a greedy, not an avaricious, not a selfish life, but a life which is ideal, born of the quickened soul and intellect,—just in this proportion they become capable of experiencing, not only the highest satisfactions and pleasures, but also the most exquisite sorrows and the profoundest disappointments. This is what man pays for being civilized; he increases his capacity to suffer as well as to enjoy. The two capacities do not increase in the same ratio, perhaps; but yet they keep within plain sight of each other. Certain it is that the natures made of the finest, cleanest, purest stuff know best what keenest suffering is. Physical pain may be dulled with opiates and soon forgotten; but pain of the heart or of the mind lasts on and on,—its tears fall inward, not outward, and its sad eyes turn from the painful cause with slow and lingering motion. The light and frivolous person experiencing disappointment can recover readily and pass to something else, finding speedy relief in change and variety; but the earnest, serious, and faithful soul receives a deeper wound, the anguish of which it can assuage only by lifting its whole life nearer to some grand and noble work.

Now it is a fact that among the most intellectual, thoughtful, rational, and truly religious persons in the community there are many whose hearts are daily aching with disappointment and unrest; and who, because of failure that has touched their hopes and plans, and the general incompleteness that seems to attend on life, are questioning whether life itself is worth the pains it costs, and are looking forward with rather pleasant anticipation to that rest, that end, that oblivion which the grave somehow appears to promise to give them at last. They are brave persons, ready to face any fact and acknowledge any truth. They are not afraid of toil and trouble and sacrifice. But they see life slipping away and leaving so few results to them, notwithstanding all their days are piled with loads of care and labor and hurry; they see life slipping away, and the great work that they hoped to do still undone; they see life slipping away, and the best powers within them yet untried, and the noblest faculties yet unused. The shadow of disappointment settles upon them, and their questioning grows deeper and more solemn every year, "Does life pay?"

Why is this so, and what is the remedy for it? Christians generally would say that this doubt about the value of life arises from the fact that those who entertain it have put away from them the only true foundations of the faith that explains everything; and that the only way to remove this doubt is to recover that lost faith. But the time has passed when Christian theology can effectually administer to the spiritual and intellectual needs of the bravest and most intelligent men and women. They confront the universe itself, and they will have of it a better verified answer to all their questionings than any which the Church can give.

The statement about this matter which I have to make is this. It seems to me that we attempt and expect too much. Life is short, and we cannot do everything while it lasts. Let us select only a few things, and concentrate all our energies to do those. Instead of living for everybody, let us live for a few. Instead of trying to reform the world, let us try to form ourselves after a fashion that shall be helpful to those who are right about us. Let us live for ends that are more private and less public. If our life has any real, true influence it will extend without our trying to extend it; it will permeate slowly through works and persons that are nearest to us to those that are farther from us. We are too anxious to make our mark with great and telling strokes; let us be content to make it more modestly and quietly. Let us learn to live calmly and steadily, without haste and without noise. Let us study to organize repose and leisure, rather than troops of enterprises and bands of busybodies. Those who set out to be great reformers and masterful manipulators of institutions and systems will find that they have undertaken a work which refuses to be hurried, and which only the ages behold the accomplishment of. It is only here and there a man in a century, whose arm God lifts to make a long, strong mark on times and races with poems, philosophies, faiths, and polities. For the most part, the rest of us are called upon to work in comparative secrecy and silence, though with no less certainty of accomplishing what is necessary. We have need to cultivate patience, and the strength which grows in us from day to day. The opportunities that are nearest to us, how shall we fail faithfully to improve these, and be content for the time to reach no farther. "No man is a hero to his valet," it is said. But I say if we cannot be heroes and heroines to our own servants, to our own most immediate circle, to those who know us best, then we cannot hope to be to the world at large. The heroic element in character has a splendid chance to exhibit itself in small and limited arenas,—in homes and families and private friendships. If it cannot in some good degree shine there, then it is mere pyrotechnics elsewhere.

Moreover, we must believe that what belongs to us to have and to do is sure to reach us at last,—or we it. It steads not to run from our fate, says one. Magnificent fact that! It is paltry to talk of freedom, as the speech is usually indulged in. There is no freedom but that of eternal and immutable law, and the grand soul sighs for no other. We are hooped in by a beautiful necessity, and every circumstance is a part of the ordination of Deity. Let us "telescope" the universe with a discernment that is spiritual and poetic as well as logical and scientific, and behold all things lifted and borne forward on the tide of order and harmony. Let us be heroic enough to stop fuming and fretting, and harassing ourselves about the absurd and impossible. Then life will become less tragic and pathetic, and more inspiring and glorious.

AN ACCOUNT OF A GOLDEN WEDDING, WITH SOME REFLECTIONS THEREON.

EDITOR OF INDEX:—

A few days since I had the pleasure of participating in the celebration of a golden wedding, which was remarkable alike for the character of those present, and for the character of the principal parties, who have passed their lives in doing good to others.

The worthy couple, whose married life had extended through the long period of fifty years, are honored members of the society of Friends, and in the Friends' meeting-house the ceremonies of the golden wedding took place. There were present and participating as speakers representatives of most of the liberal professions, members of Orthodox churches, whilst your correspondent represented the "world's people."

The services were opened by a rather young looking "elder," who read the story of the marriage in Cana of Galilee, and then invited those present to improve the first thirty minutes of the meeting with religious discourse, after which it was to be thrown open for general speaking.

The aged pair repeated the simple marriage service of the Friends as they had done fifty years before; the marriage contract was exhibited and read, showing that on the 28th day of October, 1824, Levi Coffin and Catherine Coffin had first taken the vow which now, after so many years and under circumstances so different, they were renewing.

The speeches which followed were filled with details of the life of Levi and his wife, showing, if half of what was said is true, that all men have cause to rise up and call them blessed.

They are natives of North Carolina, where they were married. Fifty years ago, when other young men of that region were looking toward the virgin lands of Alabama and Mississippi, where a few hundreds of dollars invested in land and negroes were almost sure to yield a fortune to the men of enterprise who dared to make the venture, Levi felt within his breast the cry of the guilty sons of Jacob, "We are verily guilty concerning our brother;" and, shaking the dust of slavery from his feet, sought a home in the North. Since then his life has been devoted to the cause of the slave, to use his own words, "Not because they were better than poor white folks, but because they had fewer friends and needed help more."

His home at Newport, Indiana, was the home also of the fugitive slave; and for twenty years he fed, clothed, and sheltered an average number of one hundred and fifty per year. Removing to Cincinnati in 1846, for the purpose of opening a store for the sale of free-labor goods, he kept up his habit of aiding fugitives from slavery, and in the forty years of active life preceding the fall of slavery he had assisted thousands of men, women, and children.

At one time, the affairs of the Colored Orphan Asylum of this city being in an exceedingly unprosperous condition, there being no money to purchase food and clothing, or even to hire the domestics needed to care for the children, Levi and Catherine gave up their own home, and went into the asylum as superintendent and matron, serving without salary, and caring tenderly for the poor creatures who were doubly outcast, first because of their race, and next because of their poverty.

At the close of the war of the rebellion, he raised a large sum of money for the benefit of the freedmen, and he now devotes himself to the work of educating and elevating the negro, with as much zeal as he formerly showed in working to secure his freedom.

I could fill as much space in recounting the benefactions of these good people, performed in aid of needy persons of the white race, many members of which unite with the rescued blacks in calling down blessings upon the heads of "Uncle Levi and Aunt Katie."

While these things were being said, and much more of the same sort, I observed in the remarks of the Orthodox speakers an evident purpose of keeping Levi and the rest of us reminded of the Christian dogma, which asserts that faith and not works is the essential of salvation.

At last Levi plucked the coat-tail of a gentleman about to speak, and asked leave to say that he and his wife Catherine based their hopes of salvation, not upon the good deeds to which their friends had referred, but to their faith in the efficacy of the redeeming blood of Christ.

Now if I thought that Levi was actuated by a desire to escape hell, or to win heaven, when he was working for the slave, I should despise him most heartily; for if there is any man who deserves to go to hell, it is that man who does good only to escape the clutches of the devil.

I do not think so meanly of Levi. He has in fact a superior nature which makes him feel more keenly than other men the subtile chain which binds humanity in one. Not all the pleasures of the fabled heaven can make such men completely happy, while one sentient being in the universe is unhappy.

But if good deeds are of no avail in securing heaven, does it not also follow that evil deeds have no influence in deserving hell; and if this be true, what becomes of the claim of the Christian Church to be the great conservator of morals?

If your patience, Mr. Editor, is not exhausted, I will now make an application of the foregoing, which is only my text.

Your correspondent, "E. D. C.," who does not seem disposed to take much stock in the negro, published in your columns an article showing that there does not seem to be any relation between the morals and the religion of the freedman.

An editorial in a recent number of the Independent declares that "What the negro wants is a religion which shall have some relation to morality."

Now in the meeting I have described, besides Levi, there were a half-dozen men whose business it is to teach religion to the freedmen. One of them has been a city missionary in this place for more than twenty years, devoting a large part of his time to preaching among the colored people. Such religion as we unfortunate blacks have was taught to us by such men, and they all unite in emphasizing the declaration of Mark, "Whoso believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." There is not one word in this concerning good or bad deeds; salvation is given if you believe, damnation if you believe not.

There was recently in this vicinity a conference of ministers of various evangelical sects, who were seeking to find a basis upon which all Christians may unite. Nothing was to be put into that platform except those dogmas, a belief in which is necessary to constitute a Christian. Much was said in it concerning faith in God, in Christ, in immortality, in the plenary inspiration of the Scriptures, but not one word concerning morals.

In my youth I learned, from such preachers as Hamlin, Morris, Swormsted, Sehm, and the elder Gaddis, men standing high in the Methodist Church, that no sinner is more sure of damnation than "your moral sinner."

Is it not clear that Christianity, judged by the teachings of its votaries, is a faith, not a system of morals? Why then should there be demanded a relation between the morals and the religion of the negro who has embraced Christianity? Supposing him to be completely Christianized, does it by any means follow that he will be moralized?

Recent developments in high places of the land show that "Christian statesmen," "soldiers," and "ministers" of the white race are as apt as the negro to forget the requirements of the moral law.

Now I submit to "E. D. C.," and to the Independent, that, when white men begin to preach to us and practise before us a religion which shall have "some relation to morality," then will be full time to blame us for the alleged divorce between our religion and our morals.

REV. MR. TIBBALS' MANIFESTO.

MT. CARROLL, Ill., Nov. 27, 1874.

F. E. ABBOT, Esq.:

Dear Sir,—Noticing in last week's INDEX your mention of an attack made on Charles D. Miller, candidate for member of Assembly at Geneva, New York, on account of his religious opinions, I hand you by this mail a copy of the Morrison Times, published at Morrison, Whiteside County, Illinois. It contains a letter from Wm. C. Tibbals, who is the Methodist Episcopal Presiding Elder of this district, warning his people against voting for me for State Senator, and for about the same reasons. I am, however, happy to say that the "brethren" did not all heed Mr. Tibbals' alarm, and that I was elected, on the third instant, by about the regular party (Republican) majority.

My position on the temperance question you will best understand by reading the enclosed "Extract, etc.," which, if you deem worth the room, you may publish as a part of the current opinions of the people on the so-called "license question"—otherwise throw it in the fire.

Religiously I am called an "Infidel," but do not accept the name in its best sense; and, while I am a "Free Religionist," my sympathies are rather with Col. Higginson in his "Extra-Christian" plea of last annual meeting.

Pardon my seeming egotism in talking so much of myself. I do it that you may understand the fairness of Mr. Tibbals' attack upon me.

Yours truly, H. A. MILLS.

[The letter of Rev. Mr. Tibbals will be found quoted among our "Glimpses," and the extract alluded to is here subjoined.—ED.]

THE LICENSE QUESTION.

AN EXTRACT FROM THE INAUGURAL ADDRESS OF HON. H. A. MILLS, MAYOR OF MT. CARROLL, ILLINOIS, APRIL 15, 1873.

The oft-repeated failures, not only in our town but generally throughout the country, to secure anything like a reasonable enforcement of prohibitory laws may well arrest the attention of all thoughtful friends of law and order, and lead them carefully to inquire whether there may not be some inherent weakness in the laws themselves that renders them so generally inoperative and void. Even in a democracy, where the ballot-expression of the voice of a majority is the written law of the land, that voice may be stultified by conflicting enactments, or overslaughed by a general life-practice quite at variance with both the letter and the spirit of the attempted prohibition.

What now do we find to be the facts surrounding us, and directly bearing upon the question at issue? Simply these:—

That the manufacture and wholesale traffic in intoxicating liquors is taxed and protected by both national and State laws, for which "We, the People," are fully responsible; and also that a great majority of our citizens use liquors in one or another of their various forms, and that those who do not use them refrain only in obedience to the dictates of their own private judgment.

Recognizing these as facts, I know of no good rule of law or equity that will justify us in claiming the right of prohibition as against the retail traffic.

Either liquors are contraband and confiscate, from their manufacture to their destruction, or else they are legitimate property, and subject, like all property, to some proper rules of vending.

Wishing that this were otherwise, and saying or voting that it is not true, does not change the fact, and with material facts governments must deal.

In the light of these surroundings, it does seem to me that we may find good reason for the general failure to enforce prohibitory laws. They are inconsistent with the general law, life, and practice of a great majority of American citizens, and hence are unsustained by that moral sense of equity and justice that must exist in the minds of the people, in order to make their written laws the guide-rules of faith and practice.

If the above premises are correct (and I esteem them so), the question at issue in our late city election ceases to be one of "license or no license" in the common definition of the word, and becomes simply a question of "free or restrained traffic": tersely, "free or taxed whiskey."

The traffic exists by virtue of the unconstrained, practical support of a majority of our people. Be it ours to recognize the fact and deal with it accordingly.

That all citizens are entitled to the protection of the civil law is a self-evident proposition, for the support of which no argument is required; and whoever, in pulpit or bar-room, advocates or justifies a resort to mob-law to remove real or imaginary wrongs deserves the condemnation of all good citizens.

That spirit that would abolish the entire liquor traffic by a mad-dog slaughter of all persons engaged therein is closely akin to the spirit that animated the old Spanish Inquisition; and its advocates, having long since parted company with all sound rules of law or logic, lack only a power equal to their will to light anew the faggot, and turn again the thumb-screw on all who dare to differ from them in practice or opinion.

Let no such spirit animate our official action, but, "with malice toward none and charity for all," let us endeavor to protect all and oppress none.

Accepting the situation as I understand it, and knowing, as we all know, by a sad experience, what sorrows and crimes are ever attendant upon drunkenness, I recommend that you throw around the traffic all those municipal restraints that are known to equitable laws; that you enforce, with a stern exactness, all the penalties attached to such laws; and that you impose upon the traffic its full share of the burdens of a common taxation.

Drunkenness, too, is a crime, a crime against our best manhood, and a crime against society, for which we must each hold ourselves and our neighbors responsible; for, with all said and done that we as a "City Board" can do, we must mainly rely upon the sober good sense of our fellow-citizens for peace and good order.

The bed-rock of good society is the intelligent integrity of individual character. Opportunities for vice and crime are always with us, and we must depend far more upon an honest and cultured ideal of a self-poised, responsible manhood among our citizens than upon the penal enactments of ever so well devised laws.

No traffic can make of us drunkards without our consent, and no prohibitory laws can save us from the legitimate consequences of a wicked indulgence and gratification of the demands of appetite and passion.

We must make ourselves worth the saving, or there is a small chance of our being saved.

ATHEISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

MR. EDITOR:—

Mr. Voysey, in THE INDEX of November 19, says that John Stuart Mill, in his second posthumous work, "has touched on the subjects of religion and Christ with consummate skill and tenderness, for which his warm, sympathizing heart may well receive gratitude and renewed reverence."

By Mill's estimate of Jesus Mr. Voysey is led to say in another paragraph:—

"Atheism is indeed content to leave mankind in the idolatry of an historical personage whom it will allow in poetry to deify, so long as they will not travel beyond the confines of physical facts, or trouble themselves with speculations about the unseen powers."

And then follows:—

"We have here a fresh instance of the radical affinity between atheism and Christian gush. It would surprise you, perhaps, to learn how many millions of Christians have no other God than Christ, and boast that he alone is the true revealer and representation of God. Well, all these are divided by a mere disguise of words from atheism pure and simple."

Not to mention Mr. Voysey's oracular tone, just observe his logic.

Mill speaks kindly of Jesus, for which "he may well receive gratitude."

This shows that atheism is content to leave mankind in the idolatry of Jesus.

There is, therefore, a radical affinity between atheism and "Christian gush." The millions who worship a personal Being, who made everything from nothing, and who became incarnate in Christ a few thousand years ago, are to whom churches should be dedicated and prayer and praise offered every day; and those who believe in no such Being, who recognize the universe in its entirety as eternal, who are indisposed to give anthropomorphic qualities to the power of which all phenomena, as presented in consciousness, are manifestations, who believe in no incarnations, no supernaturalism, who have no system or form of worship,—these two classes are substantially alike, the difference between them being only of a verbal character!

Not only one but several of Mr. Voysey's letters seem to indicate that he is hardly capable of doing justice to persons or principles that are in opposition to his cherished convictions.

Respectfully, B. F. UNDERWOOD.

THE RIGHTS OF NON-SMOKERS.

NORTHAMPTON, Mass., Dec. 4, 1874.

FRIEND ABBOT:—

As the smokers have been heard through Spurgeon's statement and other items copied by the INDEX, please let one of the non-smokers be heard through the enclosed article, which is to appear in the Northampton Journal of to-morrow.

Yours truly,

SETH HUNT.

THE RIGHT TO SMOKE.

Spurgeon smokes, and says there is no sin in it. He has a right to smoke; but there are a multitude of others (and I am one of them) who do not smoke; who hate the practice; who are sickened by it. They have a right not to smoke; and yet Mr. Spurgeon and his fellow-smokers force others to breathe their smoke, whether it is offensive or not. Mr. Spurgeon may think it necessary to take medicine. He has the right to do so; but he should not compel those around him to swallow poison every time he does. There is the rub in this smoking custom. The rights of non-smokers are, as a general rule, invaded by those who smoke.

I once took passage on a steamer at Geneva, Switzerland, in order to sail up the beautiful lake on which that city stands. I anticipated much pleasure and benefit from the pure air and sublime scenery. After setting sail, I found the deck, from which alone the air and scenery could be enjoyed, thronged with smokers. I had smoke in my eyes, smoke in my nose, smoke in my throat, smoke in my lungs, smoke in my clothing, smoke all around me. I viewed the Alps and Jura mountains through the haze of tobacco smoke.

I knew a man who went to an island in the Atlantic Ocean, to recruit his health by breathing the pure sea-air. The broad veranda of the hotel, where he could best enjoy the air, was almost constantly poisoned by tobacco smoke; so that he could find no corner where the air was not tainted by the fumes of the weed. The reading-room, also, was generally filled with smoke, so that the privileges of that apartment were virtually denied to non-smokers. Was that respecting the equal right of non-smokers?

I deem pure air the food of my lungs; and yet there are men who, while in the very act of forcing tobacco smoke into my nostrils, will denounce what they call sumptuary laws, meaning the liquor laws, because, they say, such laws prescribe what a man shall eat and drink. SETH HUNT.

CHURCH TAXATION IN OHIO.

CLEVELAND, O., Dec. 4, 1874.

FRIEND ABBOT:—

Temporarily sojourning in this pleasant city, I was made measurably glad in looking over the morning papers of to-day by reading an editorial in the Cleveland Herald concerning the exemption of church property.

When the daily press of the country awaken to a realizing sense of this continued outrage upon every principle of equity and justice, the battle is more than half won. When, despite the hitherto all-potent machination and influence of the Church, the American press unite for its overthrow, the victory is already gained. Meanwhile, persistent labor is demanded on the part of every emancipated soul, every liberalist, every non-sectarian, justice-loving person in the land, respectively, to do all he can at all times toward righting the wrongs involved in this question, and lifting these burdens from off an oppressed people.

Appreciating every effort made in this direction, and desirous of giving such the widest publicity possible, I herewith enclose the Herald's article for reprint in the columns of THE INDEX.

Faithfully yours, GEO. A. BACON.

Recently we suggested to the Democratic members of the General Assembly the propriety of introducing and adopting an amendment to the tax law, striking out the clause exempting church property from taxation. We made the suggestion on the ground that the Democracy have control in the Legislature and can carry their party measures, and we also suggested that the German and other "liberal" people who aided materially in placing the Democratic party in power should urge that party to the performance of this work, which has been so frequently demanded by the "free minded." But the Democrats in the Legislature were in no hurry about it, and so Representative Hodge, of this city, has taken up the task they seem disposed to shirk, and unless the bill is smothered in Committee the Democrats will have to face the music.

We have given our views on this matter of taxing church property, and presented facts and figures in support of those views. The matter scarcely seems to need argument on constitutional grounds, as in its opening clauses the State Constitution expressly declares that "no person shall be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or maintain any form of worship, against his consent;" and yet the exemption of church property from taxation compels every tax-payer to "support and maintain" forms of worship, whether he is willing or not. It makes the Roman Catholic help support the Protestant, the Protestant aid in maintaining the Roman Catholic, the Jew contribute to both, and the non-believer in churches pay for the benefit of them all. We believe nine men in every ten, even among church-goers, if asked their individual opinion on this point would say the existing practice is wrong in principle. It is true the Constitution gave the Legislature permission to exempt if it saw fit, but such exemption, though so specifically permitted, is against the spirit of the Constitution as displayed in the Bill of Rights.

For the information of those who may not have seen, or who may have forgotten, what has been given in regard to the amount of church property in the State which escapes taxation, we repeat that the census of 1850 showed less than six million dollars of this property in the State; in 1860 it had increased in value to thirteen millions; in 1870 to nearly twenty-six millions; and at the present time it is, at the rate of progression for the twenty years before the last census, no less than thirty-eight millions. This increase is greatly in excess of the increase in the value of taxable property. In 1850 the proportion of exempted church property to the total value of taxable property was 1.38 per cent.; in 1860 the proportion had increased to 1.46 per cent.; now it is 2.42 per cent.

We do not propose, just now, to go again into a discussion of the question what denomination is reaping the largest benefit from this exemption. That is unnecessary. The fact that thirty-eight millions escape taxation in contravention of the spirit of the Constitution, that this is nearly two-and-a-half per cent. of the whole taxable property of the State, and that the proportion is steadily increasing, should be argument enough for the abolition of the exemption.

ABUSE OF THOMAS PAINE.

ALTON, Ill., Nov. 24, 1874.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Enclosed I send you a slip cut from Harper's Weekly of this week. You will see its contents. We have heard some of our zealous Christian friends say that Thomas Paine was a drunkard; but we give it but little notice or credit. Coming as this does, however, in this popular journal, we are anxious to know if there is any proof of the stories. We have never seen any, unless this may be considered proof. Can you give us any light on the subject?

Even if we admit the truth of the stories, what then? Christian persecution would be largely responsible for it. No better patriot, no more bold, outspoken man ever lived than Thomas Paine; yet, because he refused to believe in the common dogmas of the day, he was maligned and abused by those claiming to be good Christians. If, maddened and goaded by these Christian fanatics, he fell into this fearful evil, they were more to blame than he.

Aside from all this, however, some of the noblest men of our age have unfortunately been confirmed drunkards. Look at the career of our noble war-Governor, Richard Yates, than whom a nobler heart never beat,—true as steel, and generous almost to a fault. What true Illinoisian but reveres the name of noble Dick Yates? Yet, alas, he was a drunkard. With our whole heart we despise this kind of meanness that would try to cover the good name of a man with shame and disgrace, because, forsooth, he had a diseased taste that made him err. But now, was Lord Byron, against whom such damaging charges are brought by Mrs. Stowe, a fit person to condemn such a man as Paine to hell? And is the dignified Harper's Weekly the fit journal to gloat over his wicked sarcasm?

Yours truly,

D. R. SPARKS.

PERSONAL.

The New York Times alludes to the fact that "the grave of Thomas Paine, near New Rochelle, which remained so long undisturbed, has been entirely obliterated by Mr. Lester, upon whose farm it was." And the New York Herald, also alluding to it, says: "In clearing up his farm, Mr. Lester cut away the underbrush, removed the loose stones, and levelled the ground, leaving no mark to indicate the immediate presence of human dust." Well, probably not, especially when we recall the fact that fifty-five years ago (in 1819) the famous William Cobbett violated the grave, and took Paine's bones back to England, and put them in the hands of a committee for the purpose of honoring them with a public funeral. That funeral never took place. After Cobbett's death, the box containing the bones was knocked about from one place to another, until finally (in 1849) they came into the possession of one Chennell, a corn merchant, in Surrey. Cobbett thought to gain a little éclat by taking over the bones, but England laughed at him. In his later years Paine was a very unclean drunkard, a very dissolute man, and so bad in every way that he died utterly detested. One of the most biting epigrams Lord Byron ever wrote was this upon Paine and Cobbett:—

> "In digging up your bones, Tom Paine,
> Will. Cobbett has done well:
> You visit him on earth again;
> He'll visit you in hell."

[According to the best of our knowledge and belief, the stories of Paine's drunkenness and vileness are utter falsehoods. The truth seems to be told in Gilbert Vale's Life of Paine, to which we refer all interested. It is a disgrace to Harper's Weekly that it should join the herd of malicious defamers of a man who ought to be held in high honor and respect.—ED.]

A MAN WAS boasting that he had been married twenty years and had never given his wife a cross word. Those who knew him said he didn't dare to.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Journal

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 1 Tremont Place, Boston.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
F. W. NEWMAN, England.
CHARLES VOYSEY, England.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

REASONS FOR USING THE

EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——;

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

THE BISHOP of London has just prohibited Bishop Colenso from preaching in his diocese.

KING KALAKAUA is the "sensation" of the day. The next one will probably be the Emperor of Hull.

THE CHRISTIAN AMENDMENT Convention is in session in Boston, as this issue of THE INDEX reaches its readers.

WHERE is the official interrogation of Mr. Potter's society as to its Christian standing? The delay begins to be distressing.

THE MEXICAN Congress has been debating the complete separation of Church and State. The same question in a milder form must come up in the United States.

THE Massachusetts Commission on taxation of church property, etc., are expected to report to the Legislature during the first week of the approaching session. While this report is pending, the proper course is to wait patiently.

NOW AND THEN the Liberal Christian has an article which shows that Unitarianism gets rid of some of its sectarian qualities as it gets out of New England. Yet we must say that it grows less and less "Christian" in proportion as it grows more and more "Liberal."

DR. CULLIS and his friends are holding a public fair in Boston, to support the Consumptives' Home which he declares is sustained solely by prayer! There is something inexpressibly revolting to a sound conscience in this persistent and unblushing misrepresentation.

THE present position of the Papacy was well expressed by Pius Ninth, when he said to Cardinal Guidi in 1870: "La tradition c'est moi." Louis XIV. declared that he was the State; the Pope now declares that he is the Church. By-and-by he will declare that he is the Almighty.

MR. ROBERT REITZEL, of the Free Religious Society in Washington, lectured last Sunday evening at the hall of the Boston Turnverein on the poetry of Mirza Schaffy, the Persian poet. Tuesday evening, he lectured in the same place on "Modern Superstition among both Catholics and Protestants." His lectures have been highly praised.

ARCHBISHOP MANNING is a sly reasoner. He declares that "subjects are bound in all things which are lawful to obey their rulers." But as the Church alone has the right to determine what things are lawful, the declaration is no admission that the Church is not above the State. The low cunning of such a sophism is likely to excite a well-grounded aversion.

BISMARCK has publicly declared that Napoleon was dragged into the Franco-German war against his will by Jesuitical influences. The world is beginning to find out that the Vatican decrees of 1870 expressed a renewed purpose to make the Papacy politically supreme. The Roman Church comes forward as the avowed enemy of popular education, political liberty, and the public peace.

MR. JOHN FISKE claims to be a Christian. But he avows opinions concerning God which the "Liberal Christians" would undoubtedly consider atheistic. There is nothing in the Constitution of the American Unitarian Association to prevent his joining it and being elected its President! The Association admits atheists, if they profess an esteem for "pure Christianity." Nothing but a creed will protect it from being captured by a brigade of Büchners.

LET IT NOT be forgotten by those who are sceptical as to the influence of the Christian Amendment party that they carried a recognition of "God in the Constitution" into the new Constitution of Pennsylvania on May 23, 1873. Only seven of the States' Constitutions are to-day free from theological allusions; and, if the question of recognizing God in the United States' Constitution were to-day put to the vote of the whole people, the chances are great that it would be affirmative. We hear the opposition, but not the approval. It is radicalism, not conservatism, that does the talking; but it is always conservatism that does most of the voting.

PRESIDENT GRANT announces in his message that he shall abandon the civil service reform, if Congress adjourns without positive legislation on the subject. This throws on Congress the responsibility of defeating the attempt to secure better appointees to civil offices. The patronage system is the chief source of corruption in the government; and both the President and Congressmen should be relieved of the irresponsible power they now exercise in this matter. Every conceivable provision for raising the average of character and ability among civil officers ought to be made. Let Congress be caused to know that the people will no longer excuse it for neglecting or secretly working against this most needed reform.

REV. S. M. CAMPBELL, D. D., a Presbyterian clergyman, denies that his denomination teaches, or within his knowledge has ever taught, the doctrine of infant damnation. The Independent refers to Calvin on this point as "fairly entitled to rank as a representative Presbyterian," and quotes this passage of his: "'For, inasmuch as the conditions of birth and death were alike to infants who died in Sodom and those who died in Jerusalem, and there was no difference in their works, why will Christ at the last day separate some to stand at his right hand, others at his left? Who will not adore this wonderful judgment of God, whereby it comes to pass that some are born at Jerusalem, whence soon they pass to a better life; whilst Sodom, the gates of the lower regions, receives others at their birth'?—De Æterna Dei Predestinatione, Tom. VIII, 611."

THE SUNDAY question is opened again in New York. Puritanism is not dead there yet. Even the Independent declares that it "desires to stand just as firmly as anybody for a quiet Sunday;" meaning, we infer, that it is opposed to permitting "sacred concerts" at which passages from Don Giovanni and La Grande Duchesse are mingled with "sacred" music. How Don Giovanni makes Sunday any less "quiet" than the Creation or the Messiah, is not apparent; and the Independent's remark is a little amusing, considering how it lectured THE INDEX a year or two ago for "Halting Radicalism." To clear up this matter, we desire to be understood as emphatically in favor of a free Sunday, on which any innocent recreation shall be allowed that does not disturb public worship in the churches. We respectfully submit that it is not our radicalism which halts this time.

FROM POUGHKEEPSIE, New York, the statement comes to us privately that "there has lately been organized a Free Religious meeting about twelve miles north-by-east of our city: the direct result of THE INDEX circulation, intensified by monthly appointments and visits. The meeting is growing rapidly, and the light from its fires draws many from the Orthodox fold. We hope the day is coming when representatives from many thousands of such meetings can assemble yearly in one general Congress, not alone to represent Boston, New York, and other cities, but the people, country, town, village, and city. It is said that Free Religion can never meet the wants of the common people; that the speculative, philosophical element of it invites the learned, but starves the commoner. We prove in our experience that it is the 'all-essential' for all conditions of men; and the common people hear us gladly."

The Death-Beds of Infidels.

DELIVERED BEFORE THE FREE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY AT NEW MILFORD, PA., SEPT. 13, 1874.

BY REV. DAVID H. CLARK.

NEW MILFORD, Pa., Nov. 18, 1874.

MR. ABBOT:—

I submit the accompanying letter and address for publication in THE INDEX. The letter shows why the address was delivered. It will be noticed that the words ascribed to Paine, "I am taking a leap in the dark." are a lapsus penne; they should have been ascribed to Hume, I think. But, rather than incur the charge of alterations, I send the letter as it was written.

Of course the subject, to really intelligent persons, is one of small importance; but there are so many in the world, especially among the adherents to the Orthodox creeds, who are not intelligent, or not as conscientious as intelligent, it seems as though there would be need to parry such thrusts of falsehood and malignity for some time to come.

D. H. C.

NEW MILFORD, Pa., Sept. 8, 1874.

REV. MR. MARTIN:

Dear Sir,—In your funeral discourse last Sunday, to which I was one of the listeners, among many irrational and inconclusive utterances, you said: "I challenge any person in the world to point me to an infidel that ever died happy." The term infidel as generally used by Christian people is a rather ambiguous one. It is indiscriminately thrown now at one class and now at another, according to their dissent from the opinions of the thrower, and therefore I am not sure of the sense in which you used it. If, however, you intended to imply those who reject what is understood as the Orthodox system of theology, I have simply to say that I have never known any persons to die unhappily but those who were brought up under such teachings. It has been my fortune to have had a large acquaintance among Universalist and Unitarian people, having been a preacher in both of these denominations for a number of years. Both, as you are aware, reject the doctrine of future punishment, without which the Christian pulpit, and especially the Methodist pulpit, would lose its chief capital.

Now, if Universalists and Unitarians cannot die happily, would not the fact become evident to every one, and should we not see them rapidly deserting what so conspicuously fails in this respect? That such is not the case plainly shows that resignation and calmness in the last hours of life are as common among them as any of the religious sects. Their biographical literature is full of confirmatory testimony to this. Need I refer to such examples as Hosea Ballou, the founder of Universalism in New England, Thomas Whittemore, and others? To Dr. Channing, the great Unitarian preacher, to Henry and Mary Ware, Thomas Starr King, Horace Mann, and a long list of those in fellowship with them? Perhaps you may say that your remark referred to a more extreme class of thinkers; but even then it would be equally untenable. What will you say of such persons as Theodore Parker, whom Christians of every name repudiated, and yet whose death was anticipated for months with a heroism and cheerfulness of spirit in full accord with the sublime life which he lived? What of the death-scene of Socrates, and numerous like examples among the ancients? What of Benj. Franklin, who, it is well known, was a rejecter of revealed religion, and of whom it is recorded that he died "tranquilly"? And of David Hume—one of the most noted infidels of the last century, of whom his biographer relates: "No believer could possess his spirit in more tranquil peace, in contemplation of the end which he saw approaching, nor meet his last hour with more cheerful resignation"? What of Abraham Lincoln? It is true that his death was a partially unconscious one; but we know that it was in a theatre, which Christian people do not consider a good place to die in, and we know, on the testimony of one who was his lawpartner for twenty years, that he was a freethinker, and until his residence in Washington (and there, doubtless, but as a concession to custom) was seldom seen inside of any church. What of Charles Sumner, the friend and correspondent of Theodore Parker, whose last words were not an expression of concern for the future of his soul, but the future simply of the race to whom his life had been devoted: "Take care of my Civil Rights Bill"? Even the words of Thomas Paine, "I am taking a leap in the dark," which Christians have so unscrupulously paraded and exulted over, are but what any really thoughtful person might say at such a time. In our own little community there have been some instances that falsify your implication. Within the last two or three weeks there passed away a person who was a disbeliever in a personal God, if I have been informed correctly. I saw this man about a fortnight before his death, and he knew he was dying; and yet he spoke of the event as calmly as any believer that ever died within the fold of the Church. Did he ever express himself otherwise? If so, we may be sure we should have heard of it. But I have cited a sufficient number of examples, inasmuch as your challenge asked for one only. I have no doubt that Mr. Williams, from all I have heard of him, was a person of most estimable character. But he was so, not because he was a Methodist, not even because he was a Christian. Good and bad persons are found everywhere—in all divisions of the Church, and probably outside of it oftener, of the highest and broadest type of character, even among those who are distinguished for their scepticism and unbelief in respect to prevalent religious theories. Of this class are a very large number of leaders in thought and reform and various lines of service in behalf of humanity. So you see how utterly without foundation, and calculated to deceive those who are uncritical in their habits of mind (as are in fact the majority of people in respect to religion), was the utterance I have considered. Whether it was made without a knowledge of the facts, or with them, you are equally culpable, and in spirit a violator of the command, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor;" because no one occupying the position of an exponent of religion is excusable for ignorance in such a particular.

Hoping that you may grow into more accurate, just, and truthful ways of speaking of those from whom you differ in opinion,

I am, sir, respectfully yours,
DAVID H. CLARK,
Preacher to the Free Religious Society, New Milford, Pa.

There is no agency of our modern life which possesses so favorable an opportunity to affect the minds of men in respect to their most important interests as the pulpit; and yet, like many others, but with less excuse, it falls far short of what we have a right to expect of it. It ought to be in fact what it assumes to be—the instructor of the people, the exponent and quickener alike of public and private morals. It should not pander to popular ignorance and prejudice. It should not come down to those it addresses in any ignoble sense, but seek to rise above them, and lead them to what is higher and better. It should not be converted into a platform for declamation, or made subservient to mere entertainment. It should be something more than an echo of old and outgrown beliefs and traditions. It should aim to be the mouth-piece of the most vital and freshest truth; to familiarize those within the sphere of its influence, so far as possible, with the latest knowledge, the most advanced theories of science and philosophy, and thus enable them continually to apprehend more thoroughly the best and truest ends of life,—their relation not alone to the planet on which they dwell, but to the universal system in which it is involved. The reason why the pulpit has declined so much in power, and is still declining, in these latter days, is because it fails so largely to keep pace with growing intelligence, and imparts so little aid in solving the great problems of existence.

There are some obvious causes for this loss of power in the pulpit in a time of such rapidly increasing enlightenment, when the tendencies to intellectual independence are so marked as at present, in the office itself. It has been the custom from time immemorial to regard the priest or preacher with especial veneration, as possessed of some peculiar endowment or insight into the mysteries of Deity and destiny, which enable him to propitiate the favor of heaven more easily than others, and guide the soul upon the sure path of salvation. As a consequence of this conception, his words have assumed a somewhat oracular character. I have heard of persons who took it for granted that everything they read in the newspapers is true. A similar credulity is not uncommon in respect to the preacher. There is the advantage which custom concedes to him (if indeed it can really be considered an advantage) of not being exposed to contradiction,—of seldom, if ever, having his statements subjected to public question or dispute. There is no institution or organ of popular intelligence that compares with the pulpit in these respects. The politician and the statesman occupy no such vantage-ground. Their words are subjected to an exacting judgment and unsparing criticism, which is scarcely decent at times, much less respectful. The press possesses no such prerogative. The preacher stands alone in the superstitious veneration and freedom from accountability to which I have adverted.

But there are disadvantages as well as advantages in these peculiarities. This consciousness of being invested with a certain sanctity and authority has a tendency to create an arrogant style of character, reckless and superficial habits of thought; to cause him to utter what his present impulse or feeling may dictate, rather than what will bear the test of afterthought or criticism.

Now I hold that the pulpit has no valid claim to the exemption from accountability I have indicated; that it should be held to the same accountability as any function sustaining an important relation to society; nay, more: that inasmuch as it professes to occupy a position of greater dignity and to comprehend more important interests, it should be subjected to a rule even more rigid and exacting. It is for this reason, and not because I have any special fondness for controversy or for arraigning others for their mistakes and errors, that I have brought before you the subject of this morning. It is because I hold that misrepresentations and falsehood should be rebuked always; that they have no rights which we are bound to respect in the pulpit any more than anywhere else; that the slander of a class, more especially one which suffers continual injustice, is just as bad as the slander of an individual, and should be as speedily resented; that the interests of truth are before all others, and should command our first consideration.

The challenge has been thrown out in one of the pulpits of the town "to any person in the world to point to a single infidel that ever died happy." As it doubtless emanated from an unamiable feeling toward myself and those who congregate here with me, it is but fitting that, if accepted anywhere, it should be in this place. I cheerfully respond to it. The challenge is an indirect way of stating that infidels, or, in other words, those who reject the doctrines of the popular religion, inevitably experience discomfiture and the loss of a peaceful mind in the closing hour of their lives. It is not an original one. It is in keeping with the character of the assaults which it has ever been the practice of the Church and the pulpit to make on those who have dared to reject their authority and to think for themselves. How unfounded have been the representations or rather misrepresentations of these assaults—how utterly unsustained by fact, and at variance with the truth, is well known to every well-informed and candid mind!

First, let us ask what it is to be an infidel? What is the meaning of the word? Literally, the word infidel signifies not faithful, or unfaithful. But who have been the unfaithful and the faithful of the past? Those who have cleaved to traditions and inherited authority; to prevailing opinions and customs; to that which would most redound to their comfort, reputation, and selfish interests? Or those who, renouncing these allurements, even at the sacrifice of all that men are accustomed to regard as the most desirable things of life, trusting simply in the law of progress, in the right of the human mind to think for itself, and their own convictions, have gone forth in a disbelieving and gainsaying generation as the champions and pioneers of truth in all the ages? For such as these last they have been who have been the infidels of the past. With how much justice they have been compelled to bear the name, to suffer its ignominy and reproach, it is easy to judge. Indeed, these are they who have been in reality persons of faith, contradictory as such an assertion may appear in view of the common use of the word. There is no special faith in a person cleaving to what everybody accepts—to what one has been trained to consider unquestionable and infallible. There is far more faith—if faith is synonymous with obedience to the divine voice within us, to the divinest prompting of our souls, to the noblest qualities of our nature, such as courage, self-sacrifice, heroism, devotion to what appears the truth—in breaking away from what is customary and established, when new convictions have taken possession of our minds. Really, the infidel, judged by the true standard, is the person who cannot trust anything but what he has been taught, and conforms to popular authority. Such a person walks by sight rather than by faith. A true faith does not depend upon agreement with others, nor the authorities and traditions of the past. It is fidelity to yourself, to your profoundest and sincerest thought, let it lead you wheresoever it may. With such a view of the absolute significance of faith and faithfulness, one cannot but marvel at the application which the word infidel, with its consequent odium, has received. It is the damning epithet which has been mercilessly thrown at every reformer and pioneer of the world's civilization and progress. The great religious leaders and teachers of the past were what they were by breaking away from what had gone before, by endeavoring to open to mankind a path to a nobler life, to truer conceptions of deity and duty, and the universe in which they dwelt. Thus was it of Buddha, Zoroaster, and Moses, and the philosophers of ancient time. They saw the errors and superstitions of the existing beliefs, and endeavored to supplant them with what was better. But, instead of being cordially welcomed to their task, they were invariably greeted with suspicion, enmity, and opposition. They were the heretics and infidels of their time. It was equally true of Jesus; and hence the accusation that he was guilty of blasphemy; that he sought to make himself greater than Abraham and Moses and the fathers; to be wise above what was written. It was true of Paul, second only to Jesus among the early teachers of Christianity, according to his own confession: "After the manner which men call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers." It was true of Luther, not to mention the countless number of those, known and unknown, who intervened, of whom the world was not worthy, whom the Church cast out and compelled to suffer in body and estate, and to submit to inconceivable persecutions and pains because they were infidels according to the popular authorities. It was declared that Luther was "the real serpent fallen from heaven pouring out his floods of venom upon the earth," "the rebellious apostate," "swine of hell," "renegade of the Order of St. Augustine," "misshapen bachanal," "unlearned doctor of theology;" these were some of the pet names that were given him by the representatives of Christianity, the defenders of the faith, as they considered themselves, in his day. "I prophesy," said Erasmus, "that no name under the sun will be held in greater execration than Luther's." (See D'Aubigny's History of the Reformation.)

It is thus that those who announce new truths to the world are ever treated and regarded. The Church has been accustomed, though most inconsistently and absurdly, since they were the victims of its own inhumanity and folly, to point to the triumphant faith of the martyrs who, with songs upon their lips, perished in the flames. Yet all these were heretics. They were identified with what was conceived to be detestable and pernicious infidelity. Thus the stone which the builders refused has become the head of the corner.

But infidelity changes from age to age. What is the infidelity of one age becomes the Orthodoxy of the next. Those whom the Church once cast out, as unworthy of its fellowship, now receive its most abundant honors. The time has been when the sects which now dwell peaceably together, a peace still often more feigned than real, were like an arena of wild beasts, each eager for the other's blood. Christians have persecuted Jews and Pagans; Roman Catholics and Protestants, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Puritans, Quakers, and Baptists, have all been persecuted in turn. It was not until 1828 that dissenters from the Established Church in England were eligible to civil offices; and even then the proposition met with strenuous opposition from the leading statesmen.

"It has long been seen," says a Christian writer (see Hitchcock's Christ the Spirit, p. 14), "that what has been called the infidelity of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries was, in fact, a species of Protestantism, directed against the narrowness of the Church, not a direct hostility to Christianity. It is remarkable that Collins, Toland, Chubb, and others, claimed to be Christians. . . . To understand the writings of Voltaire on this subject, offensive and narrow as they are, we must substitute for the word religion in his works superstition, and perceive it in the intolerable corruptions of the Church, as Voltaire witnessed them, and as they may be seen in Naples, and some other places. We should recollect that Luther was branded as an infidel in his time, and the Catholic Church still regards him as the arch-heretic of his day—a fit companion for the cloven-footed gentleman himself."

When Unitarianism, which is little more than traditional heresy now compared with the waning Orthodoxy of the period, first arose in New England, it was uniformly pronounced infidelity. Dr. Ellis, in his Half Century of the Unitarian Controversy, says: "The Orthodox on their part expected that they should succeed in putting down and utterly extirpating Unitarianism by identifying it with infidelity, and by discrediting all its show of argument from Scripture and Christian history, if not from reason."

This was really the purpose and aim of Orthodoxy; but the purpose has been thwarted and the aim has not been attained. One of our editors was moved to write the remonstrating words: "Let our characters be spared. We are not infidels. We are Christians with the most sincere convictions of the truth of our religion, and with a deep sense of its inestimable value. We do not deny the Lord that bought us." Universalism has had to bear the same opprobrium, as every one knows who is familiar with its history or has sustained a denominational relation to it.

Nor has the designation yet passed out of use when either of these sects come into competition with Orthodoxy, or provoke its jealousy and envy. Were they, the one or the other, the representatives of liberalism in New Milford, they would be the infidels; as it is, Free Religionists are selected for the amiable compliment. Nor is it strange that it should be so. For if it is essential to believe and accept the Orthodox system, and the doctrine of a future hell is an essential part of that system as it is, then those who reject this are no less exposed to the danger of being unreconciled to the event of death than those whose denials are more sweeping. It needs, however, but little acquaintance with the world to convince any one that Universalists and Unitarians die as happily as people in general, nor is the evidence less common in respect to other phases of dissent. No one can entertain a rational suspicion to the contrary, who has had any experience of life that is worthy to be called such, or has any power of observation worth the name.

In replying to the imputation which has been thrown out, I shall be compelled to presume much upon the argument which common observation and sense impart. The illustrations that I shall present as rebutting evidence are scattering ones. Neither my resources nor the space allotted me will allow the completeness of treatment that might be desired. I have no encyclopædia of the death-beds of infidels to which I can refer. Nor do I profess to have in mind all the particulars in respect to such instances, even of the most distinguished. The simple fact is that the lives of those who have borne the name, or who might properly be classed in such a category, have, as a general rule, been so much superior, in their acknowledged worth, to all such tests, that very little account has been made of those insignificant incidents and sayings associated with their close, which narrow-minded Christians dwell upon with so much emphasis. All men do not die alike. The death of both Christians and infidels is sometimes one of long and lingering illness. Sometimes it is sudden, and attended with but little consciousness. In the last case there may be nothing to relate, even if it were desired. Granting, therefore, that a person's death-bed generally determines his future destiny, granting also that infidels are prone to renounce their errors at such a time, does it not seem like a rather unfair adjustment of things that one should have abundant time to do so, and another should be suddenly ushered into eternity without such an opportunity? Of this we may be sure: that whenever the Church, in such instances, has been able to seize hold of anything which it could construe, by the way of inference or in any way, to the detriment of the memory of one who has opposed its benighted conceptions, it has never failed to do so. There has been and there is still an immense amount of such lying by good, pious, religious people. There were such reports in regard to the last hour of the good Dr. Channing, notwithstanding his trustful and beautiful death (see Memoirs, vol. 3, p. 484). There were similar ones of Hosea Ballou,—fortunately, in one instance, before his death, so that they were easily refuted, as the following extract from his biography shows: "About this period an infatuated preacher of future punishment, somewhere in the northern part of New York State, while in a high state of excitement, declared to his audience 'that Universalists and infidels always renounced their belief before they died,' and instanced old Hosea Ballou, as he termed him, who had lately died penitent, and fully repentant for his evil life, entirely refuting all his former belief, and praying to be saved from the wrath to come. This ridiculous assertion was reported to a paper published in the vicinity, and a copy marked and sent to Mr. Ballou. We asked him if he had not better address a brief letter to the editor, just to confound the propagator of the falsehood. 'No,' said he, 'I have learned by experience that libels, if neglected, are forgotten; if resented, they frequently pass for merited satire.'" (See Biography of Hosea Ballou, p. 354, by M. M. Ballou.)

If such has been the odium which that mild form of dissent from the popular religion of the Church called Liberal Christianity has received; if it has incurred the name of infidelity (a charge which, as usual in such cases, it has been no less ready to charge on those who have chanced to pass beyond the limits of its own circle of thought),—we can easily conjecture that those who held like sentiments three or four hundred years ago, when persecution, instead of being content with calling hard names and subjecting its victims to social ostracism, could not be appeased unless it was enabled to gloat in his blood or take his life, would fare no better.

Let me refer, as an illustration of this, to Faustus Socinus, one of the Italian reformers and the historic pioneer of modern Unitarianism, whose views were so far in advance of the most advanced of his contemporaries that he rejected much which is even to-day essential to good Orthodoxy, and might be regarded as a rationalist in his time. His gifts and virtues were remarkable, but it was conceived that they could not be associated with such impious doctrines except through the influence of the devil. "He battled manfully," we are told, "against ancient superstitions, and of course met opposition on every hand. Complaint being lodged against him before the civil power for publishing certain views of magistracy he withdrew from the capital city of Cracovia, and established himself at a place a few miles distant. A spirit like his could not be resisted. His cause grew rapidly, and he had proof of his success in the persecution which he experienced. Upon the publication of his book concerning the Savior, his enemies stirred up the mob to make an assault upon his person. On the verge of his sixtieth year, after a life of singular gentleness and purity, he was dragged from his chamber, where he had been resting a few days for the renovation of his health, and was carried through the principal streets amid clamor for his execution; but he was rescued by friendly hands, and found shelter in a quiet village nine miles distant, where with his pen he still exercised a commanding influence. At the opening of spring, he breathed his last words, which were these: 'No less full of envy and trouble than of days, I do with a joyful and undaunted hope incline to the period of my appointed time, which is both a discharge of sorrow and a reward of labor.'" (Monthly Religious Magazine, article Faustus Socinus, vol. 6.)

Another victim of the intolerance of that time was Giordano Bruno, to whom Prof. Tyndall alludes in his recent address as one of the pioneers of modern science,—the friend of Sir Philip Sidney, a poet, philosopher, and theologian, and one of the most original and brilliant intellects of his time. Having thrown aside the garb of a Dominican monk, which he had at first worn, and incurred the enmity, not only of this order, but of the ecclesiastics in general, on account of his attacks upon them and the dogmas of the Church, the adoption of the Copernican system of astronomy, and his opposition to the philosophy of Aristotle, pursued by malignant persecution, he wandered from one country of Europe to the other as a lecturer and teacher. At last he fell into the hands of the Inquisition, and, having been pronounced guilty of apostasy and atheism, after six years of gloomy confinement and repeated resorts to torture to induce him to recant, he was burned at the stake in one of the squares of Rome. To the final words of his judges, he said: "Perhaps you more tremble to pronounce sentence upon me than I to hear it." "They offer him the crucifix; he turns aside his head—he refuses to kiss it." "They light the fagots; the branches crackle; the flames ascend; the victim writhes; and now we see him no more; the smoke envelops him; but not a prayer, not a plaint, not a single cry escapes him." The religion of Bruno was Pantheism, which was not Christianity then, nor is it to-day; but what soundness of faith could have made his death more heroic, or imparted to it greater resignation or serenity? (See Lewes' Hist. Phil.)

Benedict de Spinoza, who lived in the latter half of the seventeenth century, is pronounced by Milman in his History of the Jews "the undoubted parent of what is called the Rationalist system and the Pantheism of modern Germany." "The fundamental axioms of his philosophy" he declares to be "utterly irreconcilable, not only with the peculiar and vital doctrines of Christianity, but even with the moral system of Socinus and his school." A Jew by birth and education, he soon grew weary and dissatisfied with the ceremonies of his people, and rejected the instruction of his teachers. Turning aside from the barren fields of tradition and theology, he preferred to roam in pastures ever new of science and philosophy. Possessing a mind of great acuteness and metaphysical power, he enunciated views and speculations which aroused against him the bitterest opposition. Bribery and assassination were employed to turn him from the path upon which he had entered, but in vain. At length the sentence of excommunication, attended with curses and horrible devices to awe and terrify, was pronounced upon him. According to the form in which it was administered, "no one might communicate with him orally or by writing, no one show him any favor, no one be under the same roof with him, or within four ells' distance, no one read any writing executed or written by him." The character of Spinoza, although he stood outside alike of the pale of Jewish and Christian fellowship, is acknowledged by each to have been one of the most aspiring, conscientious, heroic, and pure in the annals of men. A slender constitution combined with an excessive devotion to study rendered him an easy prey to consumption, which after a protracted illness terminated his existence. He was, we are told, calm and contained, and occupied to the end upon the great problems to which his life had been dedicated. The people with whom he lived had no thought that his death was so near. They went to church one Sunday, leaving him in his usual cheerful mood of mind with his physician. On their return, they learned that he had expired very peacefully in their absence. (See Milman's Hist. Jews, vol. 3, p. 381; also Benedict Spinoza, Christian Examiner, May, 1863.)

The name of Priestley has recently been conspicuously brought before the public through the commemoration of his great discovery of oxygen gas. Priestley was distinguished for the versatility of his genius and accomplishments, and the gentleness and purity of his character. He was eminent as a theologian, and also as a scientific investigator and discoverer. As a thinker and writer, he was one of the most radical of his time, and would doubtless occupy the same relative position in the present. As a consequence, he was, as is ever the case in such instances, the constant subject of persecution. The name of infidel and even atheist was freely applied to him. A brutal mob, whose passions and prejudices had been insidiously wrought upon by the clergy and politicians of his day, at length attacked his residence at Birmingham, England, and set it on fire. Priestley barely escaped with his life. He subsequently came to America, and died at Northumberland in this State. To his little grandchildren, gathered about his bedside to bid him good-night, he uttered his last words: "I go to sleep like you; but we shall wake together, and I hope to eternal happiness." (See Popular Science Monthly, August, 1874.)

It is related of Diderot, one of the most intellectual of the French atheists of the last century, of whom Carlyle has said that he possessed the most encyclopædical head ever seen in the world, that he died "a lingering but quiet death." "He once quotes from Montaigne the following as the sceptic's viaticum: 'I plunge stupidly head-foremost into this dumb deep which swallows me and chokes me in a moment, full of insipidity and indolence. Death, which is but a quarter of an hour's suffering, without consequence and without injury, does not require peculiar precepts.'" (Carlyle's Essays, vol. 3, p. 107.)

"Of the sickness of Voltaire and his death-bed deportment," Carlyle remarks: "Many foolish books have been written, concerning which it is not necessary to say anything. The conduct of the Parisian clergy, on that occasion, seems totally unworthy of their cloth; nor was their reward, so far as concerns these individuals, inappropriate — that of finding themselves once more bilked, once more persiflés by that strange old man in his last decrepitude, who in his strength had wrought them so many griefs. . . . Voltaire had enough of suffering and of mean enough suffering to encounter, without any addition from theological despair. His last interview with the clergy who had been sent for by his friends, that the rites of burial might not be denied him, is thus described by Wagnière, as it has been by all credible reporters of it:—

"'Two days before that mournful death, M. l'Abbé Mignot, his nephew, went to see the curé of St. Sulpice and the Abbé Gautier, and brought them into his uncle's sick room; who, being informed that the Abbé Gautier was there, "Ah, well," said he, "give him my compliments and thanks." The Abbé spoke some words to him, exhorting him to patience; the curé of St. Sulpice then came forward, having announced himself, and asked of M. de Voltaire, elevating his voice, if he acknowledged the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ. The sick man pushed out his hands against the curé, shoving him back, and cried, turning abruptly to the other side, "Let me die in peace." The curé seemingly considered his person soiled, and his coif dishonored by the touch of the philosopher. He made the sick nurse give him a little brushing, and then went out with the Abbé Gautier. Voltaire expired, says Wagnière, with the most perfect tranquillity, after having suffered the cruellest pains. Ten minutes before his last breath, he took the hand of Morand, his valet-de-chambre, who was watching by him, pressed it, and said, "Morand, I am gone." These were the last words uttered by M. de Voltaire.'" (Carlyle's Essays, vol. 2, p. 52.)

"It appears from his various biographers," says another, "that during Paine's last illness he was subjected to repeated annoyances from the 'pious.' Everybody was ambitious of converting him to the 'true faith;' and, as a consequence, his residence was completely besieged with aspirants to the honor. Particulars of one of these visits are given by Mr. Clio Rickman in his life of Paine, which is rather amusing. He says: 'One afternoon a very old lady, in a scarlet cloak, knocked at the door and inquired for Thomas Paine. Mr. Jarvis (the person with whom Paine then resided) told her he was asleep. 'I am sorry for that,' said she, 'for I want to see him very particularly.' Thinking it was a pity to make an old woman call twice, Mr. Jarvis waked him. He arose upon one elbow, and, with an expression of eye that staggered the old woman, asked, 'What do you want?' 'Is your name Paine?' 'Yes.' 'Well, then, I come from Almighty God to tell you that, if you do not repent of your sins, and believe in our blessed Savior, Jesus Christ, you will be damned, and'— 'Pooh, pooh, it is not true. You were not sent with any such impertinent message. Jarvis, make her go away. Pshaw! he would not send such a foolish, ugly old woman about with his messages. Go away! go back! shut the door.' The old lady retired in mute astonishment."

A similar case is mentioned by Mr. Sherwin, another of Paine's biographers, in his work, page 220, alluding to a visit which Paine received from the Rev. Mr. Milledollar, a Presbyterian minister, and the Rev. Mr. Cunningham. He states: "The latter gentleman said, 'Mr. Paine, we visit you as friends and neighbors. You have now a full view of death; you cannot live long; and whosoever does not believe in Jesus Christ will assuredly be damned.' 'Let me have none of your popish stuff,' replied Paine; 'get away with you. Good-morning, good-morning.' Mr. Milledollar attempted to address him, but he was interrupted with the same language. When they were gone, he said to Mrs. Hedden: 'Don't let 'em come again; they trouble me.' Their pious anxiety soon prompted them to renew their visit, but Mrs. Hedden told them that they could not be admitted, and that she thought the attempt useless, 'for, if God did not change his mind, she was sure no human power could.'"

"The day before he died, Dr. Manley (Paine's medical attendant) declared he purposely paid him a very late visit with a view to ascertain the true state of his mind. After asking him several questions about his belief, without receiving any answer, he endeavored to qualify the subject by saying: 'Do you believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God?' He answered: 'I have no wish to believe on the subject.' These were the last words, according to Dr. Manley, that Paine uttered. He died on the 8th of June, 1809; and it is stated by one of his biographers (Chutham, who was also his greatest enemy) that 'he died placidly, and almost without a struggle.'" (Death Bed Repentance. A lecture by Robert Cooper. E. Truelove, London, 1857.)

The name of Rousseau is eminent in the category of unbelief. Mr. Alger, in his Genius of Solitude, speaks of him as one who, despite his defects, "defended the cause and served the interests of freedom, virtue, and humanity, with an eloquence never equalled, and with a practical effectiveness rarely surpassed." Nevertheless, he was an outcast of the Church and branded as an infidel, driven from his own country, and then from one after the other, and his life continually embittered through ecclesiastical hate and persecution. "In the British Cyclopædia, article Rousseau," says Robert Cooper in the lecture from which I have quoted above, "we find the following account of the last words of Rousseau, uttered to his wife, a few minutes before his death:—

"'Be so good as to open the windows, that I may have the pleasure of seeing once more the verdure of the fields. How beautiful it is! How pure the air! How serene the sky! What grandeur and magnificence in the aspect of Nature! Look at the sun whose smiling aspect seems to call me hence! This is my God—God himself, who opens to me the bosom of his paternal goodness, and invites me to taste and enjoy that eternal tranquillity which I have so long and so ardently panted after.' Soon after uttering this noble exclamation, he calmly quitted the stage of human existence. So much, then, for the 'awful death-bed' of this extraordinary man!"

I referred in the letter at the head of this discourse to David Hume, famous not only as an historian and philosopher, but no less noted as an infidel. The words there cited are from a volume by Lord Brougham, entitled Men of Science and Letters (article Hume). I find also this allusion to Hume in Mr. Cooper's lecture: "We find ample particulars of his death in the sequel to his Autobiography. In that work there is a letter written by Dr. Adam Smith, author of the Wealth of Nations, addressed to William Strahan, Esq., giving an account of the last moments of David Hume. In this letter the doctor gives a copy of one which he received from Dr. Black, Hume's physician and friend, the day after Hume had expired. It is as follows:—

"'EDINBURGH, Aug. 26th, 1776.

"'Dear Sir,—Yesterday, about four o'clock, afternoon, Mr. Hume expired. The near approach of his death became evident in the night between Thursday and Friday, when his disease became excessive and soon weakened him so much that he could no longer rise out of bed. He continued to the last perfectly sensible, and free from much pain or feeling of distress. He never dropped the smallest expression of impatience; but, when he had occasion to speak to the people about him, always did it with affection and tenderness. I thought it improper to write to bring you over, especially as I had heard that he had dictated a letter to you, desiring you not to come. When he became very weak, it cost him an effort to speak, and he died in such a happy composure of mind that nothing could exceed it.'

"Dr. Adam Smith is reported to have paid the following tribute to Hume: 'Upon the whole, I have always considered him, both in his lifetime and since his death, as approaching as nearly to the idea of a perfectly wise and virtuous man as perhaps the nature of human frailty will admit.'

"In the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (see Mr. Cooper's lecture) Gibbon passed some very severe but just strictures upon the origin and rise of the Christian religion. For this crime he had the honor of being placed among the class of infidels, and consequently received his due share of clerical abuse. Of course, being an infidel, his death-bed was as awful as the rest. Let us see. The only authentic particulars which we can obtain are to be found in the sequel to his Autobiography written by Lord Sheffeld, his most intimate and confidential friend. His lordship says:—

"To the last he preserved his senses; and when he could no longer speak, his servant having asked him a question, he made a sign to him that he understood him. He was quite tranquil, and did not stir; his eyes half shut. About a quarter before one he ceased to breathe. The valet-de-chambre observed that Mr. Gibbon did not at any time evince the least sign of alarm or apprehension of death; and it does not appear that he ever thought himself in danger, unless his desire to speak to Mr. Darrell (one of his friends) may be considered in that light."

There are few expounders of Orthodoxy who are familiar with the writings of the great poet and philosopher of Germany, Goethe, who would be willing to admit that he possessed a "saving faith," or one likely to insure a peaceful death-bed. It is well known that he belongs to the list of the sceptics or infidels. And yet read these words in regard to his departure: "About eleven in the morning he expired," says the record, "without any apparent suffering, having a few minutes previously called for paper for the purpose of writing, and expressed his delight at the arrival of spring."

I find in an eloquent and most admirable, appreciative discourse by the Rev. W. R. Alger, entitled Lessons for Mankind from the Life and Death of Humboldt, some passages which are pertinent to the theme before us: "Is Humboldt in hell? Is this genial sage of society, this imperial statesman of science, this illustrious law-giver in the domain of thought, this guileless benefactor of men, this sublime saint of Nature, a victim of eternal damnation in hell? According to the current creeds of Christendom, he infallibly is. For he was no Orthodox in belief, no church pietest in practice. He was undoubtedly a materialist. He did not attribute personality and teleological aims to the Sovereign Power of the universe. He thought of the mind as an incarnation of organic force which must reattain immunity from individual control, and wander abroad again a particle of the dynamic whole." "At all events, those who in studying his writings are able to read between the lines cannot fail to perceive that he nowhere affirms the theist's God, nowhere expects conscious immortality. But he was ever true, and just, and meek, and good. With profoundest devotion and sincerity of awe and love, of grateful wonder and submissive will, he worshipped the Infinite Order, Beauty, Beneficence,—giving it no name, unless it was Kosmos. Without the intellectual creed of theology or the Church attitude of confession, he still had the Christian character and disposition in a striking degree. It may justly be said of him that he was more religious in his unbelief than most men are in their belief. The spirit of piety filled every crevice of his soul and breathes pervasively in his writings. He loved his neighbor as himself and never did an unjust, an unclean or an ungenerous act." "So unsound was Humboldt known to be in the faith, and so defective in the ritual, that some of the most zealous preachers repeatedly attacked him with extreme acrimony, calling him an 'atheist' and a 'soul-murderer.' But he calmly forgave their indecent assaults and epithets, and made no reply. If Orthodoxy of dogmatic belief and sacramental observance be the condition of salvation, the good Humboldt is in hell. And he is there in pretty good company, with an immense majority of the greatest philosophers and scientists of all ages, such as Socrates, Aristotle, Archimedes, Cicero, Bruno, Newton, Locke, Priestley, Lavoisier, Franklin, Goethe. For none of these, and very few in the starry throng of their peers, were Orthodoxists." "Without a murmur, without a pang, without the least reluctance, rather like a weary child luxuriously falling asleep between his father's arms and his mother's lap, Humboldt surrendered his soul to God, his dust to the earth, delightfully exclaiming with his last breath, as the rays of the sun played on his couch: 'How beautiful is this light! it seems as a kind message from heaven.'"

One of the most famous names in literature in recent times is Henry Thomas Buckle, author of a work of immense research, masterly generalization, and rare originality and vigor of thought, entitled The History of Civilization in England. It was the theory of Buckle that the religions of the world, Christianity being no exception, were each like their governments, the characteristics of their society or general civilization,—a natural development in the order of human progress, the result of their circumstances and antecedent causes.

According to this view, the conception of Christianity as a supernatural revelation or system is a fiction. He is represented to have been a person of great excellence of character. Becoming exhausted by overwork, he sought rest and recovery in travel in the East, where, overtaken by a fever incident to the climate, he suddenly passed away. His last words were, "Oh, my book, my book!" a much nobler ejaculation, in view of the service which he aspired to render to mankind through it, than if it had been one of those stereotyped phrases of superstition's mingled fear and ecstasy which most Christians consider so essential at such a time.

I might extend this list indefinitely with similar proof to that presented, in refutation of the malicious and slanderous implication that infidels, because of their disbelief in Christian irrationalism, die less happily than others. I might point among more recent deaths to that of John Stuart Mill, one of the profoundest philosophers and noblest characters of modern time. His father having been educated under the austerities of Scotch Presbyterianism became an atheist, and "died without fear of death, and without hope of heaven," Although a most exemplary person, his aversion to all forms of religion was so great that the son was assiduously guarded, as he declares, from any such belief. So far as he cherished any speculative opinions in regard to the subject, they doubtless more nearly agreed with what is called atheism than anything else. Among much which has been written concerning him since his decease are these words: "Nor did the approach of death cause the smallest wavering, as in so strong and firm a mind it was impossible that it should, in his convictions on the subject of religion. His principal satisfaction, after he knew that his end was near, seemed to be the thought of what he had done to make the world better than he found it; and his chief regret, in not living longer, that he had not time to do more." I might point to such examples as Louis Agassiz, who, if not one of the most radical of scientific thinkers, could not at least be included among Orthodox believers; and to Strauss and Feuerbach, two of the most famous infidels of Germany in modern time, who not long since passed away.

Every one who knows anything of English secularism (or atheism) is familiar with the names of the brothers Austin and George Jacob Holyoake, who for the last thirty years have been two of its most noted exponents. The former of these died in the early part of the present year. Before his death he wrote "Thoughts in a Sick Room," a communication to the National Reformer, Mr. Bradlaugh's paper, from which I am tempted to extract a few sentences:—

"All those persons who have taken the trouble to read what I have written in the National Reformer for some years past, and also published in pamphlets, will know what my opinions on death and immortality recently were. Those views were formed when I was in perfect health, and after years of reflection and inquiry. I am now about to state how my views remain after protracted suffering.

"Christians constantly tell freethinkers that their principles of 'negation,' as they term them, may do very well for health; but when the hour of sickness and approaching death arrives, they utterly break down, and the hope of a 'blessed immortality' can alone give consolation. In my own case, I have been very anxious to test the truth of this assertion, and have therefore deferred till the latest moment to dictate these few lines. . . .

"For twenty years past my mind has been entirely free from misgivings or apprehensions as to any future state of rewards and punishments. I do not believe in the Christian Deity, nor in any form of so-called supernatural existence. I cannot believe in what I cannot comprehend. I shall be accused of presumption in expressing disbelief in an idea which has commanded the faith of some of the best intellects for centuries. This I cannot help. I must think for myself; and if each of these great men had been asked to define his God, it may safely be predicted that no two would have agreed. . . .

"I do not believe in a heaven, or life of eternal bliss after death. There is nothing in this world to induce me to give credence to the possibility of such a state of human existence. . . . An eternal hell seems to me too monstrous for the belief of any humane man or sensitive woman; and yet millions believe in it. Like heaven, it is enormously disproportionate to the requirements of the case; as man can never confer benefits deserving an eternal reward, so it is impossible for him to commit sins deserving eternal punishment. . . .As I have stated before, my mind being free from any doubts on these bewildering matters of speculation, I have experienced for twenty years the most perfect mental repose; and now I find that the near approach of death, the 'grim king of terrors,' gives me not the slightest alarm. I have suffered, and I am suffering, most intensely both by night and day; but this has not produced the least symptom of change of opinion. No amount of bodily torture can alter a mental conviction. Those who, under pain, say they see the error of their previous belief had never thought out the problem for themselves."

The closing paragraph of the communication from which I have made these quotations is as follows: "To the true courage and patience of my dear and devoted wife I owe my present tranquillity. In my little son and daughter I have all a father's hope and confidence, and it softens the pain of parting when I contemplate leaving them with one who has all the—[Mr. Austin Holyoake commenced the dictation of this last paragraph a few hours before he died; but being soon exhausted had to break off, and was not able to resume it.—Ed. National Reformer.]"

In THE INDEX of August 13, there appeared an account of the life and death of Peter Engelmann, a learned and influential teacher of Milwaukee, who, notwithstanding his well-known infidel opinions, commanded the general respect of the community by the genuine worth and sincerity of his character. Although it was his request that no formal obsequies should be observed at his funeral, the appreciation of the usefulness and virtues of his life was such that it was one of the largest ever witnessed in the city. Bravely and sweetly as he lived, so he died, conscious of death's approach and without a dream of a future existence.

If it is impossible for a person to die happily unless he believes in the creed of the Church, as is so often affirmed by bigoted and unscrupulous Christians, what of Germany, in which these doctrines are well nigh abandoned? What of the death-beds of Jews, who have never accepted Christianity? What of the Pagan religions, and the millions who have died in them, and still are dying? The world owes more to its sceptics and infidels than to any others. They have been the bravest and truest of our humanity, the pioneers of progress in every age. When the Church was deluging society in blood, and persecuting with the most relentless cruelty every one who dared to have an opinion of his own, it was sceptics like Voltaire, and such as he, odious as the Church has endeavored to render their names, who rebuked that intolerance, exposed its hideousness, and, by the force of their powerful arguments, ridicule, and invective, even at the cost of fine and imprisonment, sometimes of life itself, arrested the course of inhumanity. That these men were sincere, that they sought to serve their day and generation to the utmost of their ability and opportunity, who can doubt? To think that such persons, after lives of such experience, should be stricken with a sudden distrust or sense of the impiousness of what they have so valiantly contended for and honestly held, in the presence of an inevitable natural event, and give it up in a moment, shows but little knowledge of the nature of the human mind. When we consider that those who have been guilty of the most atrocious crimes, according to the teachings of those who entertain such notions, may be translated at once into eternal blessedness and purity if they but utter a few pious sentences as they are swung out of the world, surely there should be but little anxiety for these, even though their views may differ ever so widely from our own. Let us be assured that the noblest life makes the happiest death; and that he lives the noblest who sacrifices most for his fellow-men, whose life is most devoted to what he conceives to be the truth.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

(Before Baron Pigott.)

THE PECULIAR PEOPLE.

Thomas Hines, a respectable-looking man, surrendered to take his trial for the manslaughter of Joseph Hines, his son, a child two years of age. The prisoner was also charged upon another indictment with having neglected to provide the same child with medical assistance, at a time when it was seriously ill, and thereby endangered the life of the child.

The prosecution was conducted by Mr. Poland and Mr. Beasley on behalf of the Treasury; the prisoner had no counsel.

The prisoner is a member of a religious sect who style themselves the Peculiar People, and their belief is that it is sinful and contrary to the will of God to call in medical assistance in cases of illness, no matter how severe or dangerous that illness might be, and that it is sufficient to carry out the injunctions of St. James—to call in an elder to pray over the sick and to anoint the body with oil. The child in question was robust and healthy down to the 1st of June, when it was attacked with convulsions, became worse on the 25th of that month, and died on the 6th of July. During the interval an elder named Hurry was called in, and he prayed over the child, and its body was anointed with oil. It was not disputed that, with the exception of not calling in a doctor, every attention was paid to the child during its illness. It was provided with arrowroot, brandy and water, wine and water, and other things of the like kind, and there did not appear to be any doubt that the prisoner seriously believed that he was doing everything in his power to promote the recovery of the child. Shortly before, another child of the prisoner's was attacked with measles and was treated in the same way and recovered. Dr. Sharpe, who made a post-mortem examination of the body, said that he found adhesions in both sides of the chest, and a quantity of pus, and the pericardium was also very much inflamed, and this was the cause of death. If leeches had been applied the inflammation might have been allayed, and he should also probably have administered calomel. He would not, of course, take upon himself to say that these applications would have positively saved the child's life, although he said that if he had seen the child a fortnight previous to his death the symptoms of the malady would have been perfectly plain, and the remedies he had mentioned were likely to have proved beneficial.

Baron Pigott, at the close of the evidence for the prosecution, inquired of Mr. Poland how he proposed to make the prisoner criminally liable under these circumstances.

Mr. Poland said he should submit that in the case of a child of tender years, where the child was unable to provide for itself, it was the duty of a parent to provide all proper necessaries for the child, and that, in case of illness, medical assistance was as much a necessary as food.

Baron Pigott said the mere neglect on the part of a parent to provide medical assistance for a child who was ill did not amount to such culpable negligence as would support a charge of this description. It might be an error of judgment, but, as a judge, he should be sorry to rule that it was a criminal offence.

In answer to questions put by the learned judge, Dr. Sharpe stated that a difference of opinion would probably exist in the medical profession as to the propriety of using either the remedy of leeches or administering calomel in such a case as the one under consideration.

Mr. Poland submitted that in the case of a child breaking a rib, and the broken bone entering the lung, and death being imminent, a parent would surely be bound to call in some skilled person to set the bone.

The learned judge said that was a very different case to the present, and when such a case arose he should have no difficulty in dealing with it.

Mr. Poland said it was not so much a question of punishment as to have the law upon the point settled.

After some further legal discussion had taken place, Baron Pigott said he was clearly of opinion that there was no case to go to the jury, and that there had been no culpable negligence established against the prisoner, but that, on the contrary, he appeared to have done all that he could for the child according to the best of his judgment. His views might be superstitious, but there was nothing to show that there had been any neglect of duty on his part; he had conferred with his learned brother, Mr. Justice Quain, and the Recorder in reference to the matter, and they both concurred in this opinion. It might be an ignorant mistake altogether on the part of the prisoner, but there was nothing like intentional neglect of duty, or anything in his conduct which in his opinion could be dealt with in a criminal court. If the Legislature thought fit to make it an offence not to call in a medical man under such circumstances, and to make it compulsory as in the case of vaccination, they might do so, and then persons holding the religious opinions of the prisoner would be bound to conform to the law; but as the law at present stood, he was of opinion that there was no case to go before a jury, and that the prisoner must be acquitted.

A verdict of Not Guilty was consequently recorded.

The learned judge told the prisoner, as he was leaving the bar, that he thought he would do well to consider whether, in resolving not to employ a medical man, he, with those who entertained the same religious opinions, were not acting upon superstitious motives. He thought they ought to be aware that medical assistance was very useful in a great many instances, and that they ought to reflect whether they, being in a very small minority of the community, would not do well to defer to the opinions entertained by the large majority upon the subject of obtaining medical assistance where it was required.—London Daily News.

IGNORANT VOTERS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir,—Believing with you that the community ought to ask of those demanding female suffrage, "What use would be made of the power if we gave it?" I wish to call the attention of your readers to some important statistics in the last census. In 1870, there were 748,976 white men unable to read or write, and 1,145,718 white women. The whole number of illiterates over twenty-one, both white and colored, was 1,551,213 men and 2,092,050 women. In New York, female suffrage would have added 121,667 ignorant voters to the 77,160 already possessed by your State, and in Pennsylvania 123,735 to the 67,110 found there in 1870; thus raising the illiterate vote in each State to nearly 200,000, and almost trebling it, while only doubling the entire number of possible voters. The percentages of illiterate to the whole number of their sex over twenty-one were in New York 7 to 10, but in Pennsylvania 7 3-4 to 14 1-4. In Florida, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, a little more than half the men were illiterate, but almost three-fifths of the women. In Arizona, also, the proportion was 56 per cent. among the women, but less than 22 per cent. among the men, while in New Mexico the male percentage was but 64 and the female 90. The latter cases are extreme and crucial ones, as the advocates of the great Sixteenth Amendment proposed extending its benefits to every Territory as well as every State. So large a part of our political corruption is due to the ignorance of the voters that it is hard to see how female suffrage, which would increase that ignorance so immensely and so disproportionately, would purify politics.

These facts are made much worse on account of the well-known difference between men and women, of equal culture otherwise, in degree of interest in politics. A striking proof of this was furnished me at the State University of Wisconsin, where I heard, from the professors giving instruction about the Constitution of the United States and the History of Political Institutions, that the young men were on the average much more interested and proficient in these branches than the young ladies, though the latter were their equals in other studies. At my own visits to these recitations I was much struck with the difference between the eager faces of the young men and the jaded ones of the painfully toilsome or reprehensibly inattentive girls.

In view, however, of the plainly increasing interest of women in politics, as well as of the fact that in 1870 the number of male and female illiterates between ten and twenty-one was substantially equal, I believe that the time will come when female suffrage will be not only safe but beneficial, as I think that the franchise will never be used by men with sufficient zeal and care to secure good government until it is shared by women. But at present any decrease of the average of both special and general fitness to vote would be extremely dangerous. The fact that we have more than a million and a half of ignorant male voters is a sufficient reason for refusing to let in more than two millions more of ignorant female ones. The first duty of the reformer is not to increase the quantity of our voters, but to improve their quality.

THE ANTI-RELIGIONISTS.

Taylor Lewis, writing in the Nation, says: "There is a wonderful consistency, as well as persistency, in the movement of the irreligious party in this country. They demand nothing less than the perfect wiping out of everything in the Constitution and statute-book, in political or judicial action, that favors, or seems to favor, any religious principle whatever. They demand the abrogation of all Sabbath laws. They declare that Sabbath observances by public bodies are a violation of this alleged principle of neutrality. Courts and legislatures have no right to waste the people's time and money by adjourning on one day in seven, out of deference to any religious idea, however long its standing, or however deeply it is connected with the social life. The oath must be abolished; it is a religious act, a recognition, moreover, of God and retribution. Prayers in Congress must cease; the practice is the entering wedge of Church and State. Chaplainships in the army and navy must be discontinued. However perilous the condition or the country, there must be no proclamations from Presidents and Governors appointing days of supplication to any Supreme Ruler; there is no power higher than the people, and magistrates must not defer to individual superstition. On the same ground they are opposed to all legislation for the improvement of public morals. The State, boldly and consistently say, is not a moral power, and cannot act from moral reasons. Is all this to be conceded? Why not, if the premise involved in this school question, this entering wedge of anti-Christ and State, be sound and consistent."

WHAT IS THE "APOSTLES' CREED"?

The creed called the "Apostles' Creed" is familiar to all who are accustomed to hear the Episcopal church service or the Methodist baptismal service, or to study the catechism of the Presbyterian church. It reads: "I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, who was conceived by the Holy Ghost; born of the Virgin Mary; suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried: he descended into hell: the third day he rose from the dead; he ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty; from thence he shall come to judge the quick and dead. I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Holy Catholic Church, the communion of saints; the forgiveness of sins; the resurrection of the body; and life everlasting." This simple creed is very ancient and venerable, dating back to the third or fourth centuries; it expresses the common belief of the Greek, the Latin, and of the Protestant churches. But there are very few who now have the temerity to hold that it was composed by the apostles, there being much against such a supposition and nothing in its favor but a tradition which bears the impress of falsity on its face. The apostles were too busy in building up men and constructing churches to make creeds. Creeds are not born in times of missionary zeal, but in days of disputation.—Christian Union.

In the scientific column of the Christian Union, August 6, reference is made to the article of Mr. A. L. Adams, in the Popular Science Review, on the subject of the "Mental Powers of Birds." It recalls to my mind an incident which came to my own personal knowledge, and which prompted the question which I ask.

A friend had given me six pairs of beautiful Calcutta doves, all pure white. I was anxious to increase my flock, and placing them in a commodious dovecote, with a row of pigeon-holes about four feet from the floor, awaited the result. Soon two of the pairs deposited eggs, and hatched each two squabs in nests about five holes apart. One afternoon I found that a little one had fallen out, and was killed. The next morning, in looking from my chamber window, I observed doves carrying up in their beaks materials for a new nest; but seeing the unusual size of the twigs selected, I went out to see how things progressed. To my astonishment I found that the doves which had their two squabs both safe in their nest had erected, during the morning hours, a barrier of twigs, about an inch and a half high, along the front of their pigeon-hole, thus guarding against the catastrophe which had happened to their neighbors. Was not this the result of a process of reasoning? Would all reasoning human beings be as wise?

A dog belonging to a gentleman who lived near Chester was in the habit of not only going to church, but remaining quietly in the pew during service, whether the master was there or not. One Sunday the dam at the head of a lake in the neighborhood gave way, so that the whole road was inundated. The congregation, in consequence, consisted of a few who came from some cottages close by, but nobody attended from the great house. The clergyman stated that, while reading the Psalms, he saw his friend, the dog, come slowly up the aisle, dripping with wet, having swam to get to church. He went as usual into the pew and remained to the end of the service.

"I can't give lots of money, and I can't sew cloaks and gowns for poor children, because I'm not rich enough, mamma. But I'll tell you what I can do; I can highway and hedge 'em!" said a bright little girl, on her return from a child's sermon. "What is that, my dear?" asked her mother. "Why it's coaxing poor children and naughty children into Sunday-school. I can't 'splain it to you, but I know just how, for the superintendent told us. And I'm going to do it."

"Paddy," said a joker, "why don't you get your ears cropped? They are entirely too long for a man." "And yours," replied Pat, "ought to be lengthened. They are too short for an ass."

MR. UNDERWOOD is lecturing very successfully in the West. He writes: "The common notion that the culture and refinement of the country are almost exclusively found at the East is a great mistake. The most appreciative admirers of THE INDEX I find out here." A list of Mr. Underwood's subjects will be found on our last page.

THE unexpected interest taken in our recent articles on Professor Tyndall and Herbert Spencer emboldens us to inflict on our readers some criticisms of Mr. Fiske's new book, to be followed by others, perhaps. If those of our subscribers who are not specially interested in the deeper philosophical questions of the day (although the great religious questions really turn upon them) should not feel inexcusably bored by articles of this character, we may possibly express some new views on "Noumena and Phenomena" and "Anthropomorphic, Cosmic, and Scientific Theism," with special reference to the Spencerian doctrine of the Unknowable. But we do not wish to be tiresome.

THE Independent of December 3 makes this handsome and candid acknowledgment with reference to Rev. E. F. Strickland: "THE INDEX persists in accusing the Independent of slandering the Rev. E. F. Strickland, who has lately withdrawn from the Baptist body on account of a change of faith. We have certainly no purpose of slandering anybody. We simply reported, at first, what his Baptist brethren said about him. Afterward an editorial in THE INDEX reported him as denying these statements, and we gave him the benefit of his denial. THE INDEX asks why we did not publish the documentary evidence which he furnished of the truth of his denial. The answer is simply that we did not see the documents. The editorial in THE INDEX about him was clipped from the paper and laid upon the desk of the editor who wrote the second note concerning Mr. Strickland, and what was said about him was based upon that editorial. The documents to which THE INDEX refers were published, we infer, in that paper. We have not seen in any of the Baptist organs any attempt to dispute the genuineness of any such documents, and, therefore, we suppose that they must have been conclusive. We are by no means inclined to accuse a man of imposture because he changes his religious belief, and are quite willing to take the testimony of THE INDEX that Mr. Strickland's papers prove him innocent of the insincerity imputed to him." We suppose that the explicit statement, in the editorial referred to, that we published the exculpatory documents in full in another column of the same issue, was carelessly overlooked by the Independent; and we desire to express our cordial appreciation of this amende honorable. In our turn, we retract the charge that the Independent has "slandered" Mr. Strickland, and express our regret that justice to him seemed to require it under the circumstances. We do not now believe that the Independent meant to "slander" him at all.

THE "RELATIVITY OF KNOWLEDGE."

Philosophy being an attempt to sum up the general results of all human thinking and introduce organic unity into human knowledge, the appearance of a new philosophic system is a notable event in the history of thought, which is in fact only the history of such systems in their genetic and general relations. The recent publication of Mr. John Fiske's Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy is of analogous importance, though his work is little else than a reproduction, in different form and with some valuable additions, of Mr. Herbert Spencer's system. To the worth of his views, the vigor of his reasoning, and the lucidity of his style, we would pay a well-deserved tribute of admiration and praise, especially with reference to the second of the three Parts into which he divides the work. The first and third Parts contain matter on which the chief philosophical criticisms of the book will turn; and because they present in fresh form Mr. Spencer's doctrine of the "Unknowable," there is much in them that will interest a large number of our readers. The purpose of this article is not to review the book as a whole, but to consider only part of the first chapter of the first volume, which discusses the doctrine of the "relativity of knowledge" as the acknowledged foundation of the entire system. As we are obliged to dissent from Mr. Fiske on many points, we wish it distinctly understood that on many other points, not specified, we quite agree with him and judge him to have done work of a high quality. Generous recognition of his ability and industry is simply his due, and we would not for a moment be supposed to withhold it, however we may be compelled to differ from some of his most important positions. Without further preliminary we will give a very brief, but we trust not unjust, abstract of a part of this opening chapter.

Mr. Fiske begins by presenting the two views of matter as divisible and as indivisible, one of which must be true if matter exists objectively at all, as equally "inconceivable;" and because he requires us to "conceive" everything that we can be said to "know," we must stand hopelessly perplexed before this contradiction, unable to solve it.

Again, with reference to the origin of the universe, Mr. Fiske offers us "three verbally intelligible hypotheses," atheism, pantheism, theism; the first holding that the universe is "self-existing," the second that it is "self-created," the third that it is "created by an external agency." We will not pause to criticise this very lame account of the "three hypotheses;" what concerns us now is the conclusion that each of the three is "inconceivable," yet that one of the three is necessarily to be accepted. "Sooner or later they all require us to conceive some form of existence which has had neither cause nor beginning; and to do this is impossible. Nevertheless, in spite of the impossibility of conceiving it, this fundamental assumption is one which we are compelled to adopt, unless we abstain from theorizing altogether upon the subject."

Further, Mr. Fiske declares it impossible "to enter into any inquiry concerning causation without eventually postulating some First Cause;" and he again proceeds to point out that every conception of a First Cause is "inconceivable." We must consider it infinite and absolute; but we thereby "have woven for ourselves a network of contradictions more formidable, more disheartening, than any that we have yet been required to contemplate."

These examples are adduced simply to illustrate the "doctrine of the relativity of knowledge;" that is, the doctrine that "we cannot know the Absolute, but only the Relative." This implies:—

"First, we cannot know things as they exist independently of our intelligence, but only as they exist in relation to our intelligence.

"Secondly, the possibilities of thought are not identical or co-extensive with the possibilities of things. A proposition is not necessarily true because we can clearly conceive its terms; nor is a proposition necessarily untrue because it contains terms which are to us inconceivable."

Although Mr. Fiske goes on to "illustrate deductively" the doctrine which he has thus "illustrated by a few empirical examples," we wish to say a word on the above. The attempt he makes to prepare the way for his own conclusions by first stupefying the intellect, bringing it up plump against a wall of alternate "inconceivabilities," and leaving it there in hopeless bewilderment how to take another step, is neither original nor admirable. Mr. Fiske borrows the method from Spencer, Spencer from Mansel, Mansel from Hamilton, Hamilton from Kant; and it has degenerated at each remove. With Kant the opposition was between contradictory arguments of the discursive reason, set forth with consummate logical skill in the famous "antinomies;" with Mr. Fiske it has sunk to a total confusion of reason with imagination. Take the first of his examples, which can be set forth in these opposing propositions:—

1. Matter is endlessly divisible.
2. Matter is ultimately indivisible.

Both of these are treated merely as "inconceivable," and the following inference is at once drawn, without the slightest pretence of analyzing the "inconceivability": "Whether we assume on the one hand that matter is absolutely solid, or on the other hand absolutely porous [a meaningless phrase], we are alike brought face to face with questions which we can neither solve nor elude." Now without pretending to solve all the questions that can be put concerning matter, we hold that this particular question of the divisibility or indivisibility of it can be settled without difficulty by simply bearing in mind one or two plain distinctions. A pebble, for instance, is an aggregate of parts, for it can be divided and subdivided far beyond the limits of actual observation; yet no process of subdivision is going on as we hold it in our hand. Whether the ultimate parts it is composed of could be divided farther, or not, is not the question; these parts exist in the pebble as actual quantities, or they could not constitute an actual aggregate. Hence, though ideally divisible in imagination, they are practically indivisible in fact, and must be so. Otherwise the very existence of matter as extended must be denied; and if idealism is assumed, the whole problem becomes absurd. Reason, therefore, asserts necessarily the practical indivisibility of matter; while imagination is left free to continue the ideal process of division till she gets tired. Instead of there being two alternate "inconceivabilities" in the case, there is only one; for reason comprehends perfectly the necessity of every actual molecular whole being composed of actual atomic parts, while there is no necessity whatever that imagination should "conceive" these parts in their actual minuteness. That is, it is reason that declares "matter is ultimately indivisible," while it is imagination that declares "matter is endlessly divisible;" and the opposition is a deceptive coördination of unlike mental processes. A very slight analysis would have convinced Mr. Fiske that he uses the term "inconceivable" in a way so loose as to involve himself in all sorts of confusions. Since ultimate atoms must exist, he may meet the "unsolved questions" as best he can.

The other "empirical examples" would disappear just as quickly, if he did not vex himself with factitious difficulties. For instance, he defines "the Absolute" as "that which exists out of all relations"—borrowing the definition from others. But, so defined, there is and can be no "Absolute" at all: for, if it existed, it must coëxist with the "Relative," whereas coëxistence is a relation, and cannot be predicated of that which is out of all relations. The "Absolute," therefore, is absolute nothing, if Mr. Fiske is allowed to define it. What wonder that he finds it "inconceivable"?

By applying this epithet indiscriminately, however, to logical contradictions and psychological disabilities, Mr. Fiske creates unreal antinomies from which he draws wholly untenable conclusions. The antinomies are soluble just as soon as the intellectual process is distinguished from the imaginative process; the "inconceivability" which results from the impossibility of comprehending a pure contradiction cannot be coördinated with that which results from the mere inability of imagination to complete an endless operation. The former is indeed the only absolute test of truth that we have, though it is a negative one alone; while the latter is no test of truth at all, whether "relative" or "absolute." A proposition cannot be true and untrue at the same time, whether in thought or in fact; while our inability to "conceive" or "represent" it by the imagination proves nothing whatever as to its truth. Yet Mr. Fiske founds his whole system on this confusion of intellect with imagination,—on exploded metaphysical antinomies which have no plausibility, even, to one who is conversant with the distinction between these two faculties. On the one hand, he only creates his antinomies by maintaining that neither of two conflicting propositions is "conceivable;" while, on the other hand, he himself destroys them again by declaring that a proposition is "not necessarily true because we can clearly conceive its terms," nor "necessarily untrue because it contains terms which are to us inconceivable"! We would emphasize this point. His original antinomies fall to the ground, if "conceivability" is not the test of truth; yet he proceeds to deny this very test! Such confusion on a fundamental point is fatal to that part of his philosophy which relates to the "Unknowable." The first condition of success in philosophy is self-consistency; and Mr. Fiske is here glaringly inconsistent with himself. If his two conflicting propositions are alike "inconceivable," he must hold that they are alike untrue, since "conceivability" is his declared test of truth; yet he goes on to declare that a proposition may be true, even if it is "inconceivable"! Thus the antinomies he has conjured up vanish away under his own touch; and philosophy must therefore wholly disregard them.

But the doctrine of the "relativity of knowledge" is altogether too important in its consequences not to be examined on its own merits, apart from the confusions and the inconsistencies noted above. It consists essentially in the already quoted dictum of Mr. Fiske: "We cannot know things as they exist independently of our intelligence, but only as they exist in relation to our intelligence." But its full significance, as employed by philosophers of the Hamilton-Spencer school, is not brought out until the above formula is coupled with these statements: that "things as they exist independently of our intelligence" [noumena] cannot be known at all; that all our real knowledge is limited to "things as they exist in relation to our intelligence" [phenomena]; and that all phenomena, in the last analysis, are merely seriated states of consciousness. In Mr. Fiske's language:—

"If we would consisten ly refrain from violating the doctrine of relativity, we must state the idealist's premise, but avoid his conclusion. We admit that 'the trees and mountains you imagine to exist away from any perceiving mind' do not really exist as trees and mountains except in relation to some perceiving mind. We admit that matter does not exist as matter, save in relation to our intelligence; since what we mean by matter is a congeries of qualities—weight, resistance, extension, color, etc.,—which have been severally proved to be merely names for divers ways in which our consciousness is affected by an unknown external agency. . . . But we nevertheless maintain, in opposition to the idealist, that something is still there, which, to some possible mode of impressibility quite different from conscious intelligence, might manifest itself as something wholly different from, and incomparable with, matter; but which, to anything that can be called conscious intelligence, must manifest itself as matter."

Now this doctrine, as explained, we will admit for argument's sake to be true. What follows?

1. All knowledge whatever, not only by man, but by every possible intelligence (including God, if Mr. Fiske would permit God to be intelligent), must be "relative" and "phenomenal" merely. For whatever intelligence knows at all must know by means of knowing faculties; every object of knowledge must stand in relation to these faculties, and therefore be noumenally unknown; and all merely phenomenal knowledge leaves the cognizing intelligence in absolute ignorance of that which objectively exists. Consequently everything that objectively exists is absolutely unknown by every possible intelligence.

2. All relative knowledge is, objectively considered, a cheat and a sham; for knowledge of phenomena, or things as they appear, is not knowledge of noumena, or things as they are. But since false knowledge is no knowledge, and is worse than self-conscious and absolute ignorance, there is no such thing as knowledge at all, but only ignorance which fancies itself to be such. The human mind is in sorrier plight than if it did not exist. In the dry phrase of Artemus Ward, "it would be ten dollars in his pocket if he had never been born."

3. Waiving these consequences, however, the doctrine of relativity, as stated, destroys itself. Relative knowledge being reduced to a mere knowledge of seriated states of consciousness, not even this pauperized knowledge is permitted to exist. For consciousness is the knowledge of self as object by self as subject. But self as object is reduced to a simple series of conscious states; and these states, being the object of relative knowledge, must be phenomenal only. No knowledge of these conscious states, as they are really or noumenally, is possible; the phenomenal states cannot be assumed to resemble the noumenal states, without violating the relativity doctrine; and the result is that we do not even know our own states of consciousness! Pyrrhonism of a rigor hitherto unconceived is the outcome of such philosophy.

4. All objective existences being forever withdrawn from knowledge in their noumenal reality, not merely on man's part, but on the part of all possible intelligences, the entire objective universe becomes absolutely unintelligible per se. Nothing of it can ever be known but the false phenomenal semblances it puts on before beings necessarily incapable of any real knowledge, whether of it or of themselves. In short, the relativity doctrine is neither more nor less than the absolute denial of the possibility of knowledge. Yet it is confidently advanced in the name of Science! Let it defend itself, if it can, against this reductio ad absurdum.

We deny absolutely the doctrine of the relativity of human knowledge, as advanced by Hamilton, Spencer, Fiske, and so many others; and we deny absolutely the distinction of noumena and phenomena on which it rests. All the truth it contains is summed up in the statement that our human faculties, being imperfect, necessarily know their objects incompletely. Of absolute certitude we make no pretence; but we claim that knowledge is knowledge, and that the philosophy which resolves it into ignorance is a mockery of intelligence. Science is a fact of more importance than the mere co-ordination of seriated states of consciousness, or there is no fact in this universe worthy to be philosophized over; and it means that the human mind is in a directly cognitive relation to the realities of Nature. How to explain this direct cognition is a question too profound to be raised here; but the general position, at least, it is quite time to state, when so feeble and valueless a philosophy as that part of Mr. Spencer's system which deals with "the Unknowable" has enlisted in its defence and propagandism such ingenious and able writers as Professor Youmans and Mr. Fiske.

THE NEW THEATRE.

Lovers of the drama in Boston will hail the rising of the Globe Theatre like a phœnix from its ashes, more beautiful than before, with pleasure; and those who believe that the drama, like all art, is an efficient educator of society will look with great interest to the class of performances to be given there, as indicating the level of refinement to which our community has risen, and the means of further progress which it will afford. The fact that one hundred and fifty gentlemen have taken a share in the building, on condition of the right of attendance for themselves and their families, ought to give them a power of influence, one would suppose, which would enable them to uphold the manager in giving us representations tending to elevate the standard of theatrical performances. There is no doubt that the proprietor and manager, who first entered upon this business from genuine love of the drama, and not merely for pecuniary profit, would vastly prefer giving us the best works of the best minds,—the tragedies of Shakspeare, the operas of Mozart, Beethoven, and Rossini, the comedies of Goldsmith, and so forth,—if the public would sustain him in doing so. But however an individual may consent to starve for an idea, it is impossible for a corporation to do so. The theatre must be a pecuniary success, or actors cannot be paid, gas-bills, and coal-bills, and all other bills be met; and so every theatre, with however high an aim it may start, can represent little more than the average culture of the theatre-going public. It is true that by great thought and skill the people may be gradually led to better things by little and little, and a compromise be constantly made between what will pay best and what is best; but it is hard and toilsome work, and there is constant temptation to let the idea go altogether, and take the play that will draw full houses, whatever the character of the audience it draws. It is a tendency as fatal to the theatre as to the public, for it constantly narrows the circle of its supporters, and the character of the audience depends entirely upon the play. Of those who listened spell-bound to Janauschek's poetic rendering of Mary Stuart, scarcely one would be present at the representation of a low comedy or trashy melodrama. But this higher class of minds, in the abundance of their resources, do not take sufficient pains to secure the performances that really delight them.

The system which the proprietors of the Globe have adopted for this winter, of leasing the theatre to different star companies for short periods, will enable them and us to judge of the real discrimination of the public between the good and bad, so that they will be the better able to tell what will be the most popular and profitable course for the future.

We regret to see that this maiden shrine of art is to be profaned by the Opera Bouffé under the Aimée troup, which has nothing to recommend it, but is as poor in music as it is low in moral tone. Would that the empty seats might show that Boston has no wish to naturalize this spawn of French national corruption in her midst. But Janauschek, with her exquisite classical representations, and the operas of Mozart and Rossini will, we hope, draw appreciative houses which will prove how much we value the best in art. "I am sorry," said John Quincy Adams, when the Tremont Temple was given up, "that Boston cannot support one good theatre." Since his time the success of the Boston Museum under its able director has shown that Boston can support a theatre without the help of rowdyism. The Globe aims at greater elegance and higher walks of art; if its managers will have a little faith in the public, and offer them good things, and the best portion of the public will recognize that it rests with them to decide whether there shall be opportunity of choice between the good and the evil, there is no reason why Boston should not have a really good theatre for which we should be proud and grateful. Between the low-minded, vulgar crowd who will leave a refined theatre and go to lower places, and the cultivated class who will not go to the theatre at all unless it suits their ideas, there is a large class who desire amusement, and who will go to the theatre whatever its character; and to this class belong the young and impressible on whom sentiments and ideas presented with the charms of poetry, music, and scenic effect have far more influence than arguments addressed to the reason. The church and the school have their work in educating the people; but the theatre has its work also, and it is no safer to let ribaldry and licentiousness and cold cynicism and contempt of honesty be there presented in attractive form than it would be to make Gil Blas and Don Juan the text-books in the schools.

The press has its part to do in constant, frank, and fearless criticism of the plays presented, as well as of their artistic execution; and if all work together, we cannot but hope that the Globe will have a long lease of prosperity and usefulness before it, which will justify all the interest which has been taken in its resurrection from its ashes.

LONDON LETTER.

To the Editor of The Index:

Sir,—When men leave the ground of reason and common sense to soar into the airy regions of metaphysical and theological speculation, one cannot wonder that sooner or later they make themselves ridiculous. There is, of course, a broad and deep gulf between earnest thought upon a religious or metaphysical question and that kind of solemn trifling of which I complain. Compare, for instance, the book of Job and the ancient meditations of the Brahmin priesthood, on the one hand, with the time, labor, and words spent on the inquiry as to whether Adam possessed an umbilicus, or how many angels could stand on the point of a needle.

Some questions of theology are no doubt of extreme importance, or were so in the days when they were fiercely debated. One can quite understand the all-importance of the discussions respecting the nature of Christ, the conditions of salvation, the heaven and the hell of Christian belief.

But in times like these, when the human mind is agitated by far deeper problems than these; when it is seriously questioned whether there be a God at all, and whether man is immortal; when the professedly religious world stands so much in need of moral reformation, and the masses outside are to a great extent sunk in brutality and beastiality, bearing the tokens of depravity in drunkenness and cruelty—surely it is a pitiful sight to see clergymen and ministers of religion betraying an intense and almost exclusive interest in subjects utterly trivial and unworthy of notice.

We hear of controversialists who are madly excited upon the question whether or not the Apostle Peter was ever at Rome! True, the question of the authority of Rome is a very important one; but how, in the name of all reason, did it come to be mixed up with such a perfectly indifferent subject? How is it possible at this distance of time to say with certainty what places the apostle visited? Moreover, whether he went to Rome or to Jericho ought not to be deemed of so much moment as what he may have said and taught at either of those places. Then, again, supposing it to be finally settled that he was at Rome, and that tradition has truthfully handed down to us what he said and did there, what ought it to matter to us whether he spoke wisely or foolishly, whether he did or did not lay the foundations of the abominable thing called the Christian Church! The foundation which the Romanist desires to establish is out of all proportion to the enormous fabric to be raised upon it.

Your true sceptic will say: "Well, and who was this Peter that you would have the world bow down to? Do you think we care a button what your Peter or his master or advisers said or taught?"

It is only a waste of time to listen or reply to arguments which, if even correctly drawn, do not touch the real issue. Another instance of solemn trifling occurred here in London a few weeks ago.

One of the half-dozen or ten respectable gentlemen called "Patriarchs of Syria" was over here, and it was gravely debated by some of the clergy whether his blessing would work weal or woe. Such a contemptible controversy is but a step removed from witchcraft. Supposing he was the real Patriarch of Syria,—though how his genuineness could be proved, or in what it consists, is to me a mystery,—what good was his "blessing" intended or supposed to confer, more than the kind wish of some grateful beggar or tender-hearted washerwoman? Or, if he were not the real article, but only Brummagem ware, what possible harm could he do by laying his clean hands on one's head and wishing one "God-speed"?

Oh, reverend triflers, blind as a mole ye are to the real interests and perils of humanity, and yet all alive to the most imaginary, most ridiculous, most contemptible of questions ever handled by human minds!

Take a third case: The present Archbishop of Canterbury, being a born Scot, and probably the offspring of Presbyterian parents, has been assailed during the last week by the Ritualists (who detest him) on the ground that he never received proper Christian baptism; that he was only half-baptized in haste by some old nurse who wanted to make sure of his salvation, or perhaps to relieve his infant stomach of flatulence. (I know for a fact that some nurses fully expect the babies to have better health after and in consequence of their baptism.)

The answer to this dreadful accusation is a very simple one. Many years ago, when the archbishop became a scholar of Balliol College, Oxford, he was of course required to produce and deposit his baptismal certificate. The alarmed consciences may therefore be at rest on this tremendous question. But what a mournful revelation it is to us men, who see a little at least of the true solemnity of life and its mysteries, to find the professed teachers and leaders of the people caring so much about a matter of really no importance at all!

We do not care a brass farthing whether the archbishop was baptized or not. We do very much care how he has lived, and what wise words he has spoken, and what good deeds he has wrought for his country and generation. But for the rest, how can it make the smallest difference whether he was baptized or circumcised or left in a state of unsanctified nature, with all the weight upon him of his "original sin"?

If men were to give these matters but five minutes' sober reflection, how they would laugh at themselves for their prodigality of fussiness over these microscopic questions!

But what a different world it would soon be, if the same amount of time, interest, and activity as had been formerly wasted on subjects intrinsically useless and contemptible were to be bestowed on the real problems of life and on the pressing needs of social and moral reformation!

I am, sir, very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE, Dulwich, S. E., Nov. 21, 1874.

MONKS OUTWITTED.—A very rich merchant, who had an only son, made his will, by which he gave all his wealth, which amounted to 300,000 francs, to certain monks, leaving them to give to his son such a sum as they wished. The merchant died; the monks took all to themselves without wishing to give anything to the heir. The latter complained to the viceroy, who, having seen the will, asked the monks what they offered to the son. "Ten thousand francs," they replied. "You wish then to have all the rest?" "Yes, my lord; we demand the execution of the will." "That is just," said the viceroy; "but you do not understand it properly. It is said that the son shall have that which you wish; you grant ten to the heir; it is then 290,000 francs that you want. Ah well! following the clause of the will, this sum is set apart for the son. I order you to give it to him; the 10,000 francs remaining are therefore yours." They were obliged to submit.

SOME OF THE stanzas in the metrical version o the Psalms used by the United Presbyterians remind the Christian Union of the following verse, said to be in a hymn-book used on Block Island:—

> Ye mighty monsters of the deep,
> Your Maker's praises spout;
> Ye little codlings on the beach,
> Waggle your tails about!

A PARISIAN, who was known as a freethinker, met a friend the other day, and, taking him by the hand said, "I have become a Christian." "I am glad to hear it," he replied; "suppose we now have a settlement of that little account between us. Pay me that thou owest." "No," said the new-born child, turning on his heel; "religion is religion, and business is business."

THE REAL QUESTION.

It seems to me that the question presented to the radical minister is not one merely of bread and butter. Of course there may be some temptations for one to give up his convictions for the sake of a living for himself and family; but these temptations can have no enduring influence. For what slavery is more horrible and bitter than intellectual slavery, and what earnest soul could endure it, though for the most splendid position? I think the Christian Register is right in telling one to be manly and straightforward in this matter; and I can have but little sympathy with one who deliberately sacrifices his best thought for the sake of a good salary. I presume that no radical minister stays in the denomination simply to get a comfortable living. If he did, he is worthy of all contempt.

It is not a question simply of bread and butter; it is a question of fellowship, of sympathy, of work, of usefulness. It is a question of how we can best help the world into a higher life. Here is the toil and struggle through which the mind must pass. The bread-and-butter question can be easily disposed of, but not these others; they unfold into infinite complications, and only those who have been through it can know the doubts and difficulties that beset the way. At times it seems plain, and we make up our minds just what to do; then some new thought starts up, some new issue appears, and we are afloat again. If simply to think were all that we had to do, the task would be vastly simplified. But we are to apply our thought, to make it of some practical use. We are not only to be something, but we are to express in this manifold world that something which we are. So the question is, not merely how we can best think, but also how we can best put that thought into action. Man is made for action, and his duty is to find the best sphere for action.

The Christian Register refers to Samuel J. May, who did not consider that he sacrificed anything by joining in the anti-slavery movement. Of course he did not, for he found full vent for his soul. But suppose that on some question his intellectual convictions were entirely different from those of his associates, and that, if he was true to his own, he must separate from them, and either not work at all, or else work all alone, with not one of these noble souls whom he loved to help him. The "robust" manhood of May would not, I think, have kept him from a fierce and bitter struggle, and he himself would be the first to confess that the tortures of the stake are not comparable to his "martyrdom." It is no smiling matter; it is a terrible thing. The human heart yearns for sympathy; there is not too much of it in this world; and when in obedience to our convictions we give up the sympathy and appreciation of some of the noblest minds of the day, perhaps of all, and work in utter loneliness, it is a dreadful agony, compared to which the fire of the fagot is a harmless play. I declare that he is not a coward who hesitates long before he takes this fatal step, and yearns and hopes that some light may burst upon his way by which he may escape. I do not think there is money enough in the Unitarian denomination to hire a radical minister to stay in it for a single day. But there is earnestness, and enthusiasm, and genius, and nobility of mind and heart, and sweet and pure religion in it; there is inspiration in it for noble work, and opportunities for a fruitful life. These are the things that keep one. We scorn the money; there are a thousand ways by which we can get that; but these other things are so helpful to all that is most holy and beautiful in our earthly life that one cannot rashly sunder himself from them. If ever compelled to do it, it will not be with a light and easy heart. He will have no desire for the loaves and fishes; but will he ever cease to yearn for that noble fellowship of souls? It is easy enough to give up rich parishes and splendid salaries. A robust manhood does not indeed think of this as a sacrifice; but to give up some of the sweetest moral and religious inspirations of life for the sake of our intellectual convictions is indeed a martyrdom, and the sharpest pain of it comes from the very greatness of one's manhood.

S. P. PUTNAM.

[Mr. Putnam very eloquently, and no less truthfully, points out some of the higher and subtler sacrifices which fidelity to new insights may necessitate even in these prosaic times; and they need to be pointed out. If we did not touch on such things as these, but simply referred to the "bread and butter" side of the case (which is not quite fairly represented in the above letter), it was because the criticisms in view lacked all delicate and generous appreciation of them, and could only be met on the low plane of economic considerations. There are sacrifices even greater than those Mr. Putnam alludes to, which may be to-day involved in uncompromising fealty to heretical convictions; but there is no occasion for pointing them out. It is enough to say that whoever glows with the enthusiasm which once led men and women to the stake in defence of their religion will find room enough in this world still for devoted and heroic self-sacrifice—all the more because it wins no laurels here and no crown of gold hereafter. We notice that there is as much reluctance as ever to the exercise of such qualities, when individual or denominational interests are imperilled.—ED.]

BANKRUPTCY OF THE OLD PARTY-SYSTEM.

TRANSLATED FOR "THE INDEX" FROM THE GERMAN OF KARL HEINZEN.

The recent elections give us one lesson which should excite reflection in even the most thoughtless, but which, so far as we have had opportunity to examine the press, has nowhere received the slightest consideration; namely, the lesson that party business, as it has hitherto been conducted, is decidedly bankrupt; and a reconstruction on a new foundation is made absolutely necessary. By this is not meant what can be read in all the newspapers, that parties must improve, that out of their better elements a reform-party is to be built, etc., etc. No; we mean to say that, on the ground formed by the Constitution, parties must become what they are; that on this ground no lasting party-reform is possible; that all experiments on this ground are exhausted without effecting an improvement, and that whatever expedients, changes, and combinations may be contrived and attempted, they will, they must at last, terminate again in the same results which we have now reached, if we operate farther on the ground hitherto made use of.

Formerly, the people were divided exclusively into two parties. Gradually, some portions separated from these parties; these again sub-divided into those who attempted to form a new party, and those who regarded both old parties as evils, but were not decided enough to turn their backs upon them entirely, and at the decisive moment returned to the one or the other in order, at least, "out of two evils to choose the less." After continuing sufficiently long in this favorite but hopeless occupation of choosing in either case an evil, in the last presidential election another expedient was resorted to,—the experimenting with a new evil which was called "Liberal;" and they now had the pleasure of being able to choose among three evils the apparently smallest one. After this experiment, what shall the next progress be? On the next occasion shall four, six, a dozen evils be set up? The recent elections have shown that there is yet another expedient. It is an expedient of desperation. They are convinced that the choice of the "least evil" not only avails nothing, but that at last the least becomes the greatest. Why not for once seize the matter by the opposite end? Instead of deciding for "the less" to escape "the greater," choose this time outright "the greater," in order to get rid of "the less" again. It is, as we said, the resort of desperation, similar to those horse-cures by which, on behalf of desperate patients on whom all remedies have been tried in vain, a crisis is forced which must have as a result either death or improvement.

If a statesman who had been required by the American nation to devise for them a constitution should lay before them a plan accompanied by the explanation that, by the acceptance of it, they would be necessitated to choose always between two evils, such a statesman would at once be declared insane. But when this nation through its Constitution is really placed in such a position, it has every reason for regarding itself as insane, if it continually complains of the effects of old evils without reflecting on their causes and their removal. It perpetually revolves in a circle to reach an object which lies outside of the circle. Without breaking through this circle it cannot arrive at it; but cannot decide upon the breaking through. What will be the consequence? It will revolve until it is exhausted, and the circle changes into a prison which makes an end of the revolving.

Whoever in the outset had planned to construct the party-system of this country in such a manner as it now presents itself could have found no more suitable means for this than the existing Constitution, whose logical, inevitable consequences are the present state of things. An institution which periodically necessitates a contest for supremacy in the land and for the profits to be gained thereby, and which under all circumstances secures this profit for a fixed term of years, must not only lead the contesting parties gradually to regard the principles proclaimed as a secondary matter, or as a simple means of deception, but also to make use of every evil means for obtaining and maintaining their supremacy. A president whose position is independent, forming the highest representative of the Republic, and having in his hand its whole executive power with an enormous and ever-growing "patronage," must gradually be misled into arbitrariness and despotism; must learn to despise the will of the people; must look upon his subordinates as his tools, abuse his power by corruption, and place his personal interests above the common interests. A Legislature whose members after their election are independent of their electors, and can neither be instructed nor removed by them, nor in any way called to account, must gradually regard itself as the master, and the people as its servants; must learn to abuse its power for selfish purposes, and lose all sense of responsibility; but its duty of controlling the Executive must be frustrated by that Executive's power to bestow tokens of its favor, whereby a relationship of mutual compliance and corruption arises which is maintained at the cost of the common weal. A people which by its Constitution is accustomed to place its whole fate in the hands of executive and legislative representatives, whose commands it then helplessly follows, must gradually suffer the loss of consciousness of sovereignty, in a fatalistic spirit endure everything, surrender its political watchfulness, and learn to limit its entire activity to the election of its masters: an act in which at last it believes it has fulfilled its democratic task, until it has an opportunity of displaying its disappointment at the result by a repetition of the same act—with the same result.

All this must come and has come, because by the Constitution it could not be otherwise; and, as the rapidity of a falling body's descent increases with the prolongation of the space through which it falls, so do the results of an existing evil grow worse with the length of its continuance. Through tradition, custom, and inheritance, evils must become ever firmer and firmer seated, and eat deeper and deeper into the body politic, so long as the causes from which they grew continue to exist. No platform, no special laws, no reform experiments, no patching up, no party manœuvres will change anything here. Even after the best assaults, we in the end return to the old spot to find it worse than before. Only a clear recognition of the causes, and a resolute will to remove them can change an evil condition, and inspire a fresh and healthy life in the body politic.

After the people, by the recent election making use of a suicidal and desperate means, have given a lesson to the ruling party, they stand puzzled and helpless, unable to take the lesson to themselves. They know that the negative remedy which they directed against the one side can effect no positive benefit upon the other. Wherever they look, they see only the old selfishness and corruption; consideration for the interests of the party instead of the people; speculations of politicians instead of exertions of statesmen. They feel that party strifes cannot help the country, and yet they see nothing before them but the old party contests in which they must again participate. Through these party contests the point has been reached that the people no longer know whether victory may not bring still more disadvantages than defeat, and if they could they would perhaps contribute to a defeat on all sides. Has not at last the time come to open the eyes of the people, and show them the only escape out of the circle in which it has so long labored?

The bankruptcy of the old party system effected by the late elections is a gain for radicalism; but for the people it will only be a gain when they have become enlightened concerning the true condition of things, and through a recognition of cause and effect learn to find the true means of redress.—Boston Pionier.

THE "EXAMPLE" PRINCIPLE.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

In your comments on Dr. Everts' article on "The Example of Total Abstinence," you enunciate a principle, it seems to me, which should be better understood and more uniformly acted on in society. To a certain extent, also, you condemn a practice which very generally prevails among those who, with the best of intentions, seek the highest good of mankind and strive to incite them to better deeds and nobler lives. Just what one's duty is in this matter of example has perplexed many persons besides the editor of THE INDEX. Undoubtedly, there are two sides to the question, although it is generally believed that there is but one. Whoever stops to reflect will be surprised at the stress laid upon example by all writers upon morals, as well as by all public teachers. It is begun in early childhood by parents and teachers alike, who sometimes fairly nauseate the young by the constant iteration of individual cases. It is to be borne in mind, however, that we are creatures of imitation, and that the young, especially, are influenced much more by positive acts than negative precepts. Boys are often urged to be truthful because George Washington after hacking the cherry-tree did not aggravate the offence by lying. I know of a case where a boy tried his hatchet upon an apple-tree, there being no cherry-tree at hand, for the purpose of testing his own qualifications for becoming a second Washington. Having had considerable experience with youth, I have invariably found it difficult to enforce moral lessons by the multiplication of examples, whether derived from sacred books, profane history, or living individuals. The young soon acquire a genuine contempt for them. As long as society continues to be so heterogeneous in character, example, as a basis of human action, will be a two-edged sword, as liable to cut down friend as foe. Even though mankind were all of exemplary habits, I doubt whether strong individual character could be built up on such a foundation.

To a right-minded person, the fact that a given practice is wrong, as seen in individual cases, affords very positive reasons why it should be avoided. It often happens, therefore, in this matter of example, that those whose habits are bad become by that very means promoters of virtue. On the contrary, such is the constitution of the human mind, a continual reiteration of precepts and citation of examples, however good, often tend to produce a contrary course of action, especially in the young. The notorious fact that preachers' sons, as a rule, go to the bad, is a confirmation of this position. I have in mind a family consisting of four boys, in which the father, a man of most exemplary habits, made it a practice to inveigh with great force and frequency against the use of tobacco. He pointed out its evil effects in others, and adverted to his own freedom from the pernicious indulgence. His example was perfect, his precepts indisputable. He fondly dreamed that his boys were proof against the practice. Yet, owing to what, for the want of a better name, has been called the perversity of human nature, but which was in this case really curiosity, every one of those boys, to the great chagrin of their father, acquired the foolish habit very early in life. It was almost ludicrous to see how they secretly persevered, in spite of nausea, in the accomplishment of their object, determined, if possible, to outwit their father, and arrive at the solution of the problem in their own way.

I have known other cases where sons, owing to right-training on the part of the mother, have scorned its use, although pater-familias set the evil example constantly before their eyes. It became a matter of pride with them that their self-control and manhood was stronger than that of their father. Similar instances might be mentioned relating to the use of stimulants.

Let it be the aim of parents and public teachers, whether of the old or young, to develop the individuality and self-control of every human being, and society will stand on a firmer basis. No longer will the overthrow of Christianity and the destruction of all that we hold most dear be feared, because a teacher of morals and religion, high in the esteem of the world, is believed to have lapsed from virtue. Weak, indeed, is that character which remains upright only because it is upheld by the example of others. It is at the mercy of so many chances that its overthrow, sooner or later, is a foregone conclusion. The world needs a higher gospel than this, that a more unflinching manhood may be developed. For one, Mr. Editor, I thank you for preaching it, and for standing firmly by principles which, it seems to me, when fully understood and acted on, will make, not only prohibition, but all other coercive measures of less practical importance. "IN LEAGUE WITH THE DEVIL."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

You published my letter to Rev. Mr. Chambers. The following will explain itself. I send you the MS., as I could not get Forney's Press, of this city, to print it: his city editor is a Catholic. Nor would the Enquirer print it, Mr. Harding (the owner) having more faith in "Faith" than the Club.

E. M. D.

OFFICE OF THE RADICAL CLUB,
333 Walnut St., Philadelphia, Nov. 25, 1874.

REV. JOHN CHAMBERS:—

We declined publicly and respectfully your public invitation to attend your church on last Sunday week to hear your views on the "Sabbath Question." One of the members of our Club did attend, and reports that you denounced us as "in league with the devil"! We are quite aware that fulminations from the pulpit are generally delivered and accepted in a Pickwickian sense; but you are too much in earnest to make such an accusation with any but the most serious meaning. Consider what a solemn charge you have made, and that too before an audience whom you have taught that to be "in league with the devil" is to be "a child of hell"! Now whilst we freely admit that free speech will justify you in denouncing our opinions, we do not think it will in attacking our character. We suppose you anathematize us because we differ from you, but if you will reflect a moment you will see that we do not any more than you differ from us! Are not our rights equal? Who shall decide? You treat us in the same way that the Pope in Rome treats you, and in doing so countenance his assumption. Neither you nor we like any one to domineer over us. To avoid this, let each one be pope for himself, and recognize the right to differ, and recognize it gracefully and with respect for other men's convictions.

What we think is not of as much importance as what we do. Goodness does not consist as much, if at all, in what we believe as in living an open, honest, upright life. Excuse me if I also call in question your civility. It may be Christian, as we have Christianity represented, to say of an opponent, "He is in league with the devil;" but it is unconvincing and objectionable. Do not suppose that we cherish any ill-feeling because of this attack on our "good name." We can truly forgive you, for we are confident your hostility arises from ignorance of our character and our rights, and from a habit that too many clergymen have of assuming, because they are called ministers of the Gospel, that they are therefore free from the obligations which rest on other citizens.

Very respectfully, E. M. DAVIS,
President of the Radical Club.

THE DIVINE MIND.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Mr. E. L. Crane, in your issue of Nov. 26, fails, I think, to show that there is any essential variation between his supposition respecting materialism and my own. My words were that "matter is eternal and infinitely extensive, subjected to laws which are an outgrowth of itself." Mr. Crane describes it as "subject to principles and laws inherent in itself;" only stating in other words my idea. The tree grows out of the seed, or, as Mr. Crane might state it, the seed has the principle of the tree inherent in it. His language is a little more diffuse than mine, and means substantially the same thing. I agree with Prof. Tyndall when he says that he discerns in matter "the promise and potency of every form and quality of life."

As far as it goes, I believe that materialism is perfectly true. I do not know how man can fail to perceive the immutability of natural law, and that every one who obeys natural law will, so far, keep on the right path. But I affirm that this is not all the truth which is necessary for us. I propose that we consider the universe as the body (so to speak) of the Supreme Being; the means, and the only means admitting of discussion or formulation, by which he evidences Himself to man. I further propose that above this body, as high above it (if we can compare great things with small) as the mind of man is above his body, there is a Divine Mind, which regulates everything. When I think of Mr. Crane's article, the prominent idea is his mind as expressed therein, not the appearance of the words in black and white in THE INDEX. The paper, the ink, the type (matter), by means of which his thoughts are made known to me, are necessary vehicles of his mind; directly I have possession of his ideas, I can burn THE INDEX, because I have secured what I want. The vehicle ceases to be of service to me. I regard the universe as the vehicle which contains God's will to man. I believe that there are natural laws, and that there are moral and spiritual laws; and just as the man of science becomes more conversant with natural laws than the ordinary run of people, so he who investigates moral and spiritual laws learns more about them than others do. If you tell me that the lower part of a man's nature is regulated by law, and that the higher part is not—that while a man can learn definitely how to regulate his physical life, he has not equally definite teaching respecting his higher nature, then I say that I observe incongruity and learn that order is not continued. The fact of the wonderful order of natural or physical laws suggests the existence of moral and spiritual laws.

You will observe that my objection to the materialistic notion of God is that it is only partial: it speaks only of that part which is visible to the natural senses. I have nothing to say against this idea in itself, but I suggest that the enquirer should endeavor to ascertain if there be not something more to learn. How much more, I believe that, with our present powers, we can never know. When I speak of the Divine Mind, I use the words with the greatest reservation: they only serve to indicate the direction of my thoughts. For this purpose, I must use words of some sort, just as in the study of the higher mathematics I use the symbol ∞ to denote infinity. Who knows what ∞ means? Yet all mathematics agree that it is useful to employ the symbol. In the case of mathematics, ∞ may express a figure which is infinitely or indefinitely great; so great that we cannot name it. Still we think about it and discuss it. ∞ indicates infinity in the direction of figures, as the words "the Divine Mind" indicate infinity in the direction of mind. I can refer to it and discuss it as an element in my philosophy. The natural tendency of the human mind is to formulate its ideas: hence the religions of the world.

I propose, with Mr. Crane, to make a supposition for a beginning; namely, "that there is a good God at the head of affairs." After examining "closely," I "report to him that I find from this quarter abundant information as to how" to regulate my life.

Yours truly, FREDERIC R. HONEY.

THE NEW YORK "SUN" ON FREE REASON.

NEW YORK, Dec. 7, 1874.

EDITOR INDEX:

Dear Sir,—May I call your attention to the following from the New York Sun, as showing that the secular papers often strike a good blow for freedom? I quote:—

"There seems to be an influence attending the possession and exercise of ecclesiastical functions, among Protestants no less than among Roman Catholics, which inclines men in favor of despotism and against liberty. The habit of requiring assent, on pain of eternal damnation, to dogmas which are not understood, fosters an impatience of contradiction entirely at variance with free political institutions. The spirit which forbids men of science to advance theories inconsisteut with time-honored opinions easily lends itself to suppressing the criticism and reform of laws and governments. While the masses of the people—Roman Catholics as well as Protestants—are gradually advancing to the position that individual reason is no less ordained of God than government authority, their clergy cling desperately to their waning power. Undoubtedly they are needed as drags upon what might otherwise be a dangerously rapid progress. Positions that have to be fought for will not be prematurely taken, and when taken will be all the more firmly held. But that the inevitable result will be the overthrow of all authority except that which rests upon free rational assent, whether in matters of religion or of politics, is plain to every one who has eyes to see."

Do not such words from an influential New York daily assure us that all the people are not dead to the necessities of the hour?

Yours truly, "A."

Howard Co., Kansas, Nov. 10, 1874.

EDITOR OF INDEX:

Sir,—I have been a close reader of your paper for nearly a year and a half, and I conclude that you look at all things from a scientific stand-point. So I write to you to ask some scientific explanation of the phenomena call Spiritualism. I have had manifestations of what is called spirits in my own house, such as raising the table, tipping it; and I with others could not prevent it. This is done inside of my own family, and I believe there is no humbug on their part. Now, Mr. Editor, if it is not spirits, give me the proof. JOSEPH L. PATRICK.

[We are not so reckless as to attempt to prove anything in the premises. There is a new Boston paper called the Spiritual Scientist which knows all about the matter, or ought to, and we respectfully refer our questioner to it. We never undertake to explain any facts until we know exactly what they are; and it is harder than most people imagine to separate facts from fancies.—ED.]

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,			10c per line.
" 13 " 25	"		8	"	"
" 26 " 51	"		6	"	"
" 52	"		5	"	"

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX.

Bound volumes of THE INDEX for 1871, 1872, and 1873, will be sent by express (at the purchaser's expense) on receipt of $2.50, $2.50, and $3.00 respectively. These volumes are exceedingly valuable singly, irrespective of each other; for the important essays and other articles they contain are of permanent interest, and will furnish as instructive reading twenty years hence as to-day. No more valuable present could be made to a friend struggling out of Orthodoxy than one of these volumes.

REASONS FOR USING THE

EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

THE FREE

SUNDAY ADVOCATE.

A MONTHLY JOURNAL AND REVIEW DEVOTED TO THE INTEREST OF THE NATIONAL SUNDAY LEAGUE.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Journal

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 1 Tremont Place, Boston.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
R. P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
F. W. NEWMAN, England.
CHARLES VOYSEY, England.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE
FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

THERE IS only one way to do it faithfully. Send a circular to every minister, and ask him if he is a "Unitarian Christian;" and send another to every society, asking the same question. The whole matter has been referred to the proprietors of the names in the two catalogues. If they say "yes," retain the names; if they say "no," erase them.

WHEN the New York Tribune pronounces the movement in favor of inserting a recognition of Christianity in the Constitution to be "a harmless sort of amusement anyhow," it exhibits the very obtuseness which makes this movement dangerous. It is as "harmless" as cheerfully throwing lighted matches among the waste cotton of a great factory.

ALFRED JOHNSON, a tailor at 98 Newark Avenue, New York, has had his little son of seven years of age committed to prison by Justice Leonard; his complaint being that the little fellow stole five cents with which he had been sent by his father to buy beer. For this offence the poor child is confined among felons in the county jail, where his father ought to be on the score of vindictive cruelty.

AN "Equal Taxation Society" has been formed in Muir, Ionia County, Michigan, of which Mr. C. D. Hampton is Secretary. Its object is "to circulate petitions and forward them to the Legislature [of Michigan], asking that church property be taxed the same as other property." Several large packages of the tract published by the Boston Liberal League last winter have been distributed through this Society; and we hope our subscribers in Michigan will give all the "aid and comfort" they can to this laudable organization.

IN NEW ORLEANS, the white boys of the high school have just "refused to allow colored boys to enter the school-house." According to the statement of the former school superintendent, Mr. Thomas W. Conway, published in THE INDEX of October 29, colored children have been admitted to the Louisiana schools for several years, with the best results. If a renewed proscription of the negro is to be the concomitant of the return of the Democracy to power, there are a few voters at the North who wish to know the fact. We do not believe that, however disgusted over the corruptions of their leaders the Republicans of the North were shown to be by the last elections, they are prepared now, or can ever be induced, to support any party which is evidently determined to revive the hateful distinctions of color and race.

MEETINGS have been recently held in Providence, in the Mathewson Street Methodist church, to favor the establishment of sectarian schools of the Methodist persuasion. Addresses were made by Rev. W. S. Warren, D.D., President of Boston University, Rev. W. R. Clark, D.D., and others. Every friend of good education must view with uneasiness and regret the increasing tendency towards sectarian schools, in which the great Episcopalian and Methodist denominations are participating. The Catholics are determined to get control of the public schools, or else to have parochial schools of their own; and it is a very bad sign that the Protestants should follow their example. The sectarian principle means higher cost and inferior quality of education, and a general increase of reactionary influences. Patriotism has no surer test to-day than devotion to the public school system, supplemented by "compulsory education."

THE Christian Register thinks we are as much bound to advocate certain opinions by being editor of THE INDEX as any clergyman is by occupying a Unitarian pulpit; and it gives some good admonitions concerning the inviolability of contracts. Now we are very strict in our own view of the obligations of contracts. But the contract in our case is simply to edit a paper "devoted to Free Religion;" and if we could no longer do this, we should immediately resign. The trouble with the contract into which Unitarianism enters with its ministers is that it is self-contradictory, in that it makes "pure Christianity" and the "unlimited right of free inquiry" equally a part of the agreement. What we criticise is this inherent self-contradiction in the contract itself, which necessitates injustice somewhere. Let the pretence of perfect freedom be dropped, and we shall have no cause of criticism whatever. This point is always ingeniously evaded by the Register.

THE Civil Rights Bill is in great danger of being so mutilated as to be worse than worthless. Unless the distinctions of color and race are to be declared totally non-existent before the law, it is best to omit all legislation on the subject; for the passage of a bill which should in any degree recognize them as valid would give a new lease of life to injustice, and still keep the negro question in politics as an element of great disturbance. "No question is ever settled that is not settled right." We protest against giving any sanction, however slight, to the pretence that a black man, as black, is not entitled to every right conceded to the whites. If the Civil Rights Bill should be passed as Sumner framed it, and made an indestructible part of United States law as administered by United States courts; if, furthermore, it should be followed by a National Compulsory Education Act,—the negro would indeed soon be "out of politics." He never will be, until these measures are carried.

THE OPPOSITION manifested in the House of Representatives against the Bureau of Education augurs ill for the future. Mr. Cox, of New York, declared that the Bureau would be abolished by the Democratic majority in the next Congress. Mr. Garfield, of Ohio, replied that the collection and publication of educational statistics was of great utility; he protested against "putting out the eyes of the government by destroying the methods of obtaining information as to the condition of the people," and against "entering on a system which builds penitentiaries, and takes no steps to get information whether it is not possible, by a better system, to avoid the system of penitentiaries." An increase of clerical force in the Bureau was voted down; Mr. Willard, of Vermont, declaring that there is "no more reason for the Bureau of Education or of Agriculture than for a Bureau of boots and shoes." We view with deep regret such evidences of stolid indifference to the highest interests of the nation.

HOW is the question of Sunday-night performances in the New York theatres to be decided? The New York State courts will probably prohibit such performances. If an appeal should be made to the United States courts, on what grounds could such a prohibition be sustained? Only by conceding to the separate States the right of practically establishing a State religion; which Congress itself is expressly forbidden to do in the Constitution. In this grave matter the National Constitution is directly at variance with the State Constitutions; and it must remain so, with all the increasing complications and disturbances growing inevitably out of such a radical want of harmony, until either the Christian Amendment or the Religious Freedom Amendment is incorporated in the Constitution of the United States, and (in the latter case) until the State Constitutions are reformed. This necessity is clearly comprehended by the Christian Amendment party, whose movement, so far from being an affair of phrases only, is of the most practical character conceivable. Are the Liberals always to remain unintelligent or apathetic in view of an issue so real and so profound?

Encyclical Letter.

TO OUR VENERABLE BRETHREN, ALL PATRIARCHS, PRIMATES, ARCHBISHOPS, AND BISHOPS HAVING THE FAVOR AND COMMUNION OF THE HOLY SEE.

POPE PIUS IX.

VENERABLE BRETHREN, GREETING AND APOSTOLIC BENEDICTION.

With how great care and pastoral vigilance the Roman pontiffs, our predecessors, fulfilling the duty and office committed to them by the Lord Christ himself in the person of the most blessed Peter, prince of the apostles, of feeding the lambs and the sheep, have never ceased to nourish the Lord's whole flock with the words of faith and with salutary doctrine, and to guard it from poisonous pastures,—is thoroughly known to all, and especially to you, venerable brethren. And truly the same, our predecessors, the maintainers and defenders of the august Catholic religion, of truth, and of justice, being most anxious for the salvation of souls, never had anything more at heart than, by their most wise letters and constitutions, to unmask and condemn all those heresies and errors which, being adverse to our divine faith, to the doctrine of the Catholic Church, to purity of morals, and to the eternal salvation of men, have frequently excited violent tempests, and have miserably afflicted both the Christian and civil commonwealth. For which cause the same, our predecessors, have, with apostolic fortitude, constantly resisted the nefarious undertakings of wicked men, who, like the waves of the raging sea foaming out their own confusion, and promising liberty while they were the slaves of corruption, have striven by their fallacious opinions and most pernicious writings to subvert the foundations of the Catholic religion and of civil society, to remove from among men all virtue and justice, to deprave the minds and hearts of all, to turn away from true moral training unwary persons, and especially inexperienced youth, miserably to corrupt it, to lead it into the snares of error, and finally to tear it from the bosom of the Catholic Church.

We, too, had scarcely (by the hidden counsel of Divine Providence, certainly for no merit of our own) been elevated to this chair of Peter, when seeing with the greatest grief of our soul the truly awful storm aroused by so many evil opinions, and the most grievous calamities, never sufficiently to be deplored, which sweep over the Christian people from so many errors, we, as is well-known to you, venerable brethren—according to the duty of our apostolic ministry, and following in the illustrious footsteps of our predecessors,—immediately raised our voice, and in many published encyclical letters, in allocutions delivered in consistory, and in other apostolical letters, condemned the principal errors of our most unhappy age, and excited your extraordinary Episcopal vigilance; and again and again admonished and exhorted all our very dear sons of the Catholic Church to altogether abhor and shun the contagion of so dire a pestilence. And especially in our first encyclical letter written to you on the 9th day of November, 1846, and in two allocutions delivered by us in consistory, the one on the 9th day of December, 1854, and the other on the 9th day of June, 1862, we condemned the monstrous portents of opinion which especially prevail in this age, to the greatest injury of souls and to the detriment of civil society itself, which are also in the highest degree opposed, not only to the Catholic Church and her salutary doctrine and venerable rights, but also to the eternal natural law engraven by God in all men's hearts, and to right reason; and from which almost all other errors have their origin.

But, although we have not omitted often to proscribe and reprobate the chief errors of this kind, yet the cause of the Catholic Church, the salvation of souls divinely committed to us, and the welfare of human society itself, altogether demand that we again stir up your pastoral solicitude to overthrow other evil opinions, which flow from these errors as from fountains. These false and perverse opinions are the more to be detested because they chiefly tend to impede and remove that salutary power, which the Catholic Church, according to the institution and commission of her divine Author, should freely exercise to the end of time—not only over individual men, but over nations, peoples, and their sovereign rulers; and [tend also] to take away that mutual fellowship and concord of counsels between the priesthood and the civil government, which has ever proved itself propitious and salutary to religious as well as civil interests.* For you well know, venerable brethren, that at this time not few are found, who, applying to civil society the impious and absurd principle of naturalism, as they call it, dare to teach that "the best interest of public society and civil progress absolutely require that human society be constituted and governed without any regard to religion, as though religion did not exist, or at least without any discrimination between the true religion and false ones." And they do not hesitate, against the doctrine of the sacred Scriptures, of the Church, and of the holy fathers, to assert that "that condition of society is the best, in which the civil power does not recognize the obligation TO COERCE BY ENACTED PENALTIES THE VIOLATORS OF THE CATHOLIC RELIGION, except so far as the public peace may require it." Proceeding from this totally false idea of social government, they do not fear to foster that erroneous opinion, most fatal to the Catholic Church and to the salvation of souls, which was designated by our predecessor Gregory XVI., of recent memory, as insane nonsense;† namely, that "liberty of conscience and worship is the personal right of every man, which ought to be proclaimed by law, and asserted in every rightly constituted society; and that citizens have an inherent right to the complete liberty, which must not be restrained by any ecclesiastical or civil authority, of openly and publicly manifesting and declaring any of their thoughts whatever, either in speech, or in print, or in any other manner." But, while they have the temerity to affirm this, they do not think and consider that they are preaching the liberty of perdition,‡ and that, "if it be always allowed to debate with human persuasions, there can never be wanting men who dare to resist the truth, and to put faith in the loquacity of human wisdom; whereas we know, from the very institution of our Lord Jesus Christ, how faith and Christian wisdom must avoid this most hurtful vanity."‖

And, because where religion has been removed from civil society, and the doctrine and authority of divine revelation repudiated, even the genuine notion itself of justice and human right is darkened and lost, and material force is put in the place of true justice and legitimate right; thence it is evident why some persons, utterly neglecting and disregarding the most certain principles of sound reason, dare to proclaim that "the will of the people, manifested by what they call public opinion, or in some other manner, constitutes the supreme law, independent of all divine and human right; and that, in the political order, accomplished facts, simply because they are accomplished, have the force of right." But who does not see and clearly perceive that human society, when set loose from the bonds of religion and true justice, can have, in truth, no other end than the purpose of obtaining and accumulating wealth, and follows no other law in its actions but the ungoverned desire of ministering to its own pleasures and interests? For this reason, men of this sort pursue with bitter hatred the religious orders (although these have deserved extremely well of Christianity, the State, and literature), and they prate about the same having no legitimate ground of existence, and thus applaud the falsehoods of heretics. For, as our predecessor Pius VI., whose memory is still fresh, most wisely taught, "the abolition of the religious orders is injurious to the public profession of evangelical counsels; it is injurious to a method of living commended in the Church as agreeable to apostolic doctrine; it is injurious to the distinguished founders themselves, whom we venerate on our altars, who did not establish these societies but by inspiration of God."§ And these men also impiously declare that the power should be taken away from the citizens and the Church "whereby they may openly give alms for the sake of Christian charity;" and that the law should be abolished "whereby on certain fixed days servile labor is prohibited on account of divine worship;" and this on the most fallacious pretext that said power and law are opposed to the principles of the best public economy. And not content with removing religion from public society, they wish to banish it also from private families. For, teaching and professing the most fatal error of communism and socialism, they assert that "domestic society, or the family, derives the whole ground of its existence from the civil law alone; and, consequently, that from the civil law alone issue, and on it depend, all rights of parents over their children, and especially the right of providing for instruction and education." By which impious opinions and machinations these most deceitful men chiefly aim at this result: that the salutary doctrine and influence of the Catholic Church be entirely banished from the instruction and education of youth, and that the tender and flexible minds of the young be miserably infected and depraved by every most pernicious error and vice. For all who have endeavored to throw into confusion things both sacred and secular, to overturn the right order of society, and to blot out all rights, divine and human, have always (as we above hinted) devoted all their nefarious schemes, devices, and efforts, chiefly to deceiving and depraving incautious youth, and have placed all their hope in its corruption. For which reason they never cease in all abominable ways to assail the clergy, both regular and secular, from whom (as the surest monuments of history nobly attest) so many great advantages have abundantly flowed to Christianity, civil society, and literature; and to proclaim that this very clergy, "as being hostile to the true and useful progress of science and civilization, should be removed from the whole charge and duty of instructing and educating youth."

But others, reviving the wicked and so often condemned inventions of innovators, dare with remarkable impudence to subject the supreme authority of the Church and of this apostolic see, given to it by the Lord Christ himself, to the will of the civil authority, and to deny all those rights of the same Church and see which pertain to matters of external order. For they are not at all ashamed to affirm that "the laws of the Church do not bind the conscience unless when they are promulgated by the civil power; that the acts and decrees of the Roman pontiffs, referring to religion and the Church, need the sanction and approbation, or at least the assent, of the civil power; that the apostolic constitutions,* whereby secret societies are condemned (whether an oath of secrecy be or be not required in such societies), and their frequenters and favorers are punished with the ban, have no force in those regions of the world where associations of this kind are tolerated by the civil government; that the excommunication pronounced by the Council of Trent and the Roman pontiffs against those who invade and usurp the rights and possessions of the Church rests upon a confusion of the spiritual order with the civil and political order, in the pursuit of a purely secular interest; that the Church must decree nothing which binds the consciences of the faithful in regard to the use of temporal things; that the Church has no right to coerce the violators of her laws by means of temporal punishments; that it is conformable to sacred theology and to the principles of public law to assert and claim for the civil government a right of property in those goods which are possessed by the churches, the religious orders, and other pious establishments." Nor do they blush openly and publicly to profess the maxim and principle of heretics, from which arise so many perverse opinions and errors. For they repeat that "the ecclesiastical power is not by divine right distinct from and independent of the civil power, and that such distinction and independence cannot be preserved without the essential rights of the civil power being invaded and usurped by the Church." Nor can we pass over in silence the audacity of those who, not upholding sound doctrine, contend that "without sin, and without rejecting the Catholic profession, assent and obedience may be refused to those judgments and decrees of the apostolic see, whose object is declared to concern the general good of the Church, her rights and discipline, so long as this refusal does not touch the dogmata of faith and morals." There is no one who does not clearly and distinctly see and understand how grievously this is opposed to the Catholic dogma concerning the full power divinely given by Christ the Lord himself to the Roman pontiff, of feeding, guiding, and ruling the universal Church.

Amidst, therefore, such great perversity of depraved opinions, we, well remembering our apostolic office, and full of solicitude for our most holy religion, for sound doctrine, and the salvation of souls divinely committed to us, and for the welfare of human society itself, have decided to raise again our apostolic voice. Therefore, by our apostolic authority, we reprobate, proscribe, and condemn the evil opinions and doctrines, all and singular, severally mentioned in this letter, and will and command that all children of the Catholic Church hold them in every respect as reprobated, proscribed, and condemned.

And, beside these things, you know very well, venerable brethren, that in these times the haters of all truth and justice and the most bitter enemies of our religion, deceiving the people by means of pestilential books, pamphlets, and newspapers scattered over the whole world, and maliciously lying, disseminate all sorts of impious doctrines. Nor are you ignorant that also in our day some are found who, moved and incited by the spirit of Satan, have reached that degree of impiety that they do not shrink from denying our Lord and Master Jesus Christ, and from assailing his Divinity with flagitious impudence. Here, however, we cannot but extol you, venerable brethren, with great and deserved praise; you, who have not failed to raise with all zeal your Episcopal voice against impiety so great.

Therefore, in this our letter, we again most lovingly address you who, called to participate in our solicitude, are to us, amid our most grievous distresses, the greatest solace, joy, and consolation, because of the eminent religion and piety wherein you excel, and because of that marvellous love, fidelity, and dutifulness whereby, most harmoniously bound to us and to this apostolic see, you strive strenuously and sedulously to fulfil your most weighty Episcopal ministry. For from your extraordinary pastoral zeal we expect that, taking up the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God, and greatly strengthened by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, you will, with redoubled endeavors, be daily more upon the watch that the faithful intrusted to your charge "keep themselves from noxious plants, which Jesus Christ does not tend, because they are not the planting of the Father."* Never cease, also, to impress upon the said faithful that all true felicity flows upon man from our august religion, its doctrine and practice; and that happy is the people whose God is their Lord.† Teach that "'kingdoms rest on the foundation of the Catholic faith;‡ and that nothing is so deadly, leads so headlong to a fall, is so exposed to all dangers, as when, believing this alone to be sufficient for us that we received free will at our birth, we seek nothing further from the Lord; that is, when forgetting our Creator, we deny his power in order to show that we are free.'‖ And do not fail also to teach that the royal power was given not alone for the governance of the world, but most of all for the protection of the Church;§ and that there is nothing which can be more to the advantage and glory of princes and kings than (as another most wise and courageous predecessor of ours, St. Felix, wrote to the Emperor Zeno) to 'permit the Catholic Church to make use of her laws, and allow no one to oppose her liberty. For it is certainly beneficial to their interests to study, whenever the affairs of God are concerned, according to his appointment to subject the royal will to the priests of Christ, not to set it above them.'"¶

But if always, venerable brethren, it is especially now (amidst such great calamities both of the Church and of civil society, amidst so great a conspiracy of the adversaries of the Catholic cause and of this apostolic see, and so great a mass of errors) absolutely necessary to approach with confidence the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy and find grace in timely aid. Therefore, we have thought it well to stir up the piety of all the faithful, that, together with us and you, they may incessantly pray and beseech the most merciful Father of light and pity, with most fervent and humble prayers; and in the fulness of faith flee always to our Lord Jesus Christ, who redeemed us to God in his blood, and earnestly and constantly supplicate his most sweet heart, the victim of most burning love toward us, that he would draw all things to himself by the bonds of his love, and that all men inflamed by his most holy love may walk worthily according to his heart, pleasing God in all things, bearing fruit in every good work. But inasmuch as, without doubt, the prayers of men are more pleasing to God if they approach him with minds free from all stain, therefore we have determined with apostolic liberality to open to Christ's faithful the heavenly treasures of the Church, committed to us to dispense, in order that the said faithful, being more earnestly enkindled to true piety, and cleansed through the Sacrament of Penance from the defilement of their sins, may with greater confidence pour forth their prayers to God, and obtain his mercy and grace.

By this letter, therefore, in virtue of our apostolic authority, we grant to the faithful of the Catholic world, all and singular, of both sexes, a plenary indulgence in the form of a jubilee, during the space of one month only within the whole coming year, 1865, and not beyond, to be fixed by you, venerable brethren, and other legitimate local ordinaries, in the very same manner and form in which we granted it at the beginning of our supreme pontificate by our apostolic letter in the form of a brief, dated November 20, 1846, and addressed to all your Episcopal order, beginning, "Arcano Divinae Providentiae consilio," and with all the same powers which were given by us in that letter. We will, however, that all things be observed which were prescribed in the aforesaid letter, and those things be expected, which we declared to be expected. And we grant this, notwithstanding anything whatever to the contrary, even if it were worthy of special and individual mention and derogation. In order, however, that every doubt and difficulty may be removed, we have commanded a copy of said letter to be sent you.

"Let us implore," venerable brethren, "from our inmost heart and with our whole mind the mercy of God, because he himself has said, 'I will not remove my mercy from them.' Let us ask and we shall receive; and if there be delay and tardiness in our receiving, because we have gravely offended, let us knock, because to him that knocketh it shall be opened, if only our prayers, groans, and tears knock at the door, wherein we must persist and persevere; and that our prayer may be unanimous . . . . let each one pray to God, not for himself alone, but for all the brethren, as the Lord has taught us to pray." But in order that God may the more readily assent to all our prayers and desires, ours, yours, and those of all the faithful, let us with all confidence employ, as our intercessor with him, "the immaculate and most holy Mother of God, the Virgin Mary, who has slain all heresies throughout the world, and who, the most loving Mother of us all, is all sweet . . . . and full of mercy, . . . shows herself exorable to all, to all most merciful, pities the necessities of all with a most large affection,"†† and standing as queen at the right hand of Her Only Begotten Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, radiantly clothed in a golden vestment, can obtain from him whatever she will. Let us also seek the intercession of the Most Blessed Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, and of Paul, his fellow-apostle, and of all the saints in heaven, who, having already become God's friends, have entered into the heavenly kingdom, and being crowned bear their palms, and secure of their own immortality are anxious for our salvation.

Finally, imploring from our heart for you the fulness of all heavenly gifts, we most lovingly, as a pledge of our peculiar love toward you, impart, from our inmost heart, the apostolic benediction to you, venerable brethren, to all the clergy, and to all lay faithful committed to your care.

Given at Rome, from St. Peter's, the 8th day of December, in the year 1864, the tenth from the Dogmatic Definition of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary, Mother of God.

In the nineteenth year of Our Pontificate.

SYLLABUS

EMBRACING THE PRINCIPAL ERRORS OF OUR TIME WHICH ARE CENSURED IN CONSISTORAL ALLOCUTIONS, ENCYCLICALS, AND OTHER APOSTOLIC LETTERS OF OUR MOST HOLY FATHER, POPE PIUS IX.

§I.

PANTHEISM, NATURALISM, AND ABSOLUTE RATIONALISM.

I. There is no supreme, all-wise, and all-provident divine Being, distinct from this universe, and God is the same as Nature, and therefore liable to change; and God becomes actual [only] in man and in the world, and all things are God, and have the self-same substance with God; and God and the world are one and the same thing, and therefore spirit is the same as matter, necessity as liberty, truth as falsehood, good as evil, and just as unjust.

II. All action of God on man and on the world is to be denied.

III. Human reason, without any regard whatever to God, is the one judge of truth and falsehood, of good and evil; it is a law unto itself, and its natural powers are sufficient to provide for the welfare of men and nations.

IV. All the truths of religion flow from the inborn power of human reason; hence reason is the highest norm whereby man can and must attain the knowledge of all truths of every kind.

V. Divine revelation is imperfect, and therefore subject to continual and indefinite progress, corresponding to the progression of human reason.

VI. The Christian faith is opposed to human reason, and divine revelation not only does not profit but even injures man's perfection.

VII. The prophecies and miracles recorded and narrated in the holy Scriptures are the fictions of poets, and the mysteries of the Christian faith are the result of philosophical investigations; and in the books of both Testaments are contained mythical inventions; and Jesus Christ himself is a mythical fiction.

§II.

MODERATE RATIONALISM.

VIII. Inasmuch as human reason is on an equality with religion itself, therefore theological studies are to be handled in the same manner as philosophical.

IX. All the dogmas of the Christian religion are without discrimination an object of natural science or philosophy; and human reason, with mere historical cultivation, is able from its own natural powers and principles to arrive at true knowledge of even the more abstruse dogmas, if only these dogmas have been proposed to reason itself as its object.

X. Inasmuch as the philosopher is one thing, philosophy another, the former has the right and duty of subordinating himself to that authority of whose truth he has satisfied himself; but philosophy neither can nor ought to submit to any authority.

XI. The Church not only ought never to animadvert on philosophy, but ought to tolerate the errors of philosophy, and leave it to her to correct herself.

XII. The decrees of the apostolic see and of the Roman congregations impede the free progress of science.

XIII. The method and the principles according to which the ancient scholastic doctors cultivated theology are entirely unsuitable to the needs of our time and to the progress of the sciences.

XIV. Philosophy must be treated without any regard to supernatural revelation.

N. B. Connected with the system of rationalism are for the most part the errors of Antonius Guenther, which are condemned in the Epistle to the Cardinal Archbishop of Cologne: Eximiam tuam, June 15, 1857; and in the Epistle to the Bishop of Breslau: Dolore haud mediocre, April 30, 1860.

§III.

INDIFFERENTISM, LATITUDINARIANISM.

XV. Every man is free to embrace and profess that religion which, guided by the light of reason, he holds to be true.

XVI. Men may in the practice of any religion whatever find the way of eternal salvation, and attain eternal salvation.

XVII. One may well hope at least for the eternal salvation of all those who are in nowise in the true Church of Christ.

XVIII. Protestantism is nothing else than a different form of the same true Christian religion, in which it is possible to please God just as in the Catholic Church.

§IV.

SOCIALISM, COMMUNISM, SECRET SOCIETIES, BIBLE SOCIETIES, LIBERAL CLERICAL SOCIETIES.

Pests of this kind are often reprobated, and in the most severe terms in the Encyclica Qui p'uribus, Nov. 9, 1846; in the Allocution Quibus quantisque, April 20, 1849; in the Encyclica Noscitis et Nobiscum, Dec. 8, 1849; in the Allocution Singulari quadam, Dec. 9. 1854; in the Encyclica Quanto conficiamur moerore, Aug. 10, 1863.

§V.

ERRORS CONCERNING THE CHURCH AND HER RIGHTS.

XIX. The Church is not a true and perfect, entirely free society, nor does she enjoy her own proper and permanent rights, conferred upon her by her divine founder, but it is the business of the civil power to define what are the rights of the Church, and the limits within which she may exercise them.

XX. The ecclesiastical power may not exercise its authority without the permission and assent of the civil government.

XXI. The Church has not the power of dogmatically deciding that the religion of the Catholic Church is the only true religion.

XXII. The obligation by which Catholic teachers and writers are absolutely bound is confined to those things alone which are propounded by the infallible judgment of the Church as dogmas of faith to be believed by all.

XXIII. The Roman pontiffs and the œcumenical councils have exceeded the limits of their power, usurped the right of princes, and erred even in the definition of matters of faith and morals.

XXIV. The Church has no power to employ force, nor has she any temporal power, direct or indirect.

XXV. Beside the power inhering in the episcopate, there is still another temporal power, which has been granted expressly or tacitly by the civil government, and which may therefore be revoked by the civil government at its pleasure.

XXVI. The Church has no innate and legitimate right of acquiring and possessing.

XXVII. The consecrated ministers of the Church and the Roman pontiff should be entirely excluded from all charge and dominion over temporal things.

XXVIII. Bishops have no right, without permission of the government, even to publish apostolic letters.

XXIX. Graces granted by the Roman pontiff should be accounted void, unless they have been sought through the government.

XXX. The immunity of the Church and of ecclesiastical persons had its origin in civil law.

XXXI. The jurisdiction of the Church in the temporal causes of the clergy, whether civil or criminal, ought to be entirely abolished, even without consulting, and against the protest of, the apostolic see.

XXXII. Without any violation of natural right and equity that personal immunity may be abrogated, whereby the clergy are exempted from the burden of military duty and service; and such abrogation is required by civil progress, especially in a society constituted on the model of free government.

XXXIII. It does not belong exclusively to the jurisdictional power of the Church, in virtue of her own proper and inherent right, to direct the teaching of theology.

XXXIV. The doctrine of those who compare the Roman pontiff to a free prince, exercising power in the universal Church, is a doctrine which prevailed in the Middle Age.

XXXV. Nothing forbids that by the decision of a general council, or by the act of all peoples, the supreme pontificate be transferred from the Roman bishop and city to another bishop and another State.

XXXVI. The decision of a national council admits of no further dispute, and the civil administration may proceed upon this as final authority.

XXXVII. National Churches may be instituted, which are withdrawn and totally separated from the authority of the Roman pontiff.

XXXVIII. The exceedingly arbitary decisions of the Roman pontiffs contributed to divide the Church into eastern and western.

§VI.

ERRORS CONCERNING CIVIL SOCIETY, BOTH IN ITSELF AND IN ITS RELATIONS TO THE CHURCH.

XXXIX. The state, as being the origin and fountain of all rights, possesses a right, which is circumscribed by no limits.

XL. The doctrine of the Catholic Church is opposed to the good and the interests of human society.

XLI. The civil power, even when exercised by an unbelieving [i. e. non-Catholic] ruler, has an indirect negative power over things sacred; it has therefore not only the so-called right of exequatur, but also the so-called right of appeal [against ecclesiastical ordinances involving the civil government] on account of the abuse [of ecclesiastical power].

XLII. In case of conflict between the laws of the two powers, civil law takes the precedence.

XLIII. The lay power has the authority to rescind, to declare and make void, solemn conventions (commonly called Concordats), concerning the exercise of rights pertaining to ecclesiastical immunity, which have been entered into with the apostolic see, without the consent of this see, and even against its protest.

XLIV. The civil authority may mix itself up in matters which pertain to religion, morals, and spiritual government. Hence it may judge concerning the instructions which the pastors of the Church issue in accordance with their office for the guidance of consciences; nay, it may even decree concerning the administration of the holy sacraments and the dispositions necessary for their reception.

XLV. The whole control of the public schools, wherein the youth of any Christian State is educated, only the Episcopal seminaries being in some degree excepted, may and should be assigned to the civil authority, and so assigned to it that no right be recognized, in any other authority whatever, to interfere with the school discipline, the direction of studies, the conferring of degrees, the selection or approbation of teachers.

XLVI. Nay, in the very seminaries [for the education] of the clergy, the method of study to be adopted is subject to the civil authority.

XLVII. The best constitution of civil society requires that the public schools, which are open to the children of all classes, and that public institutions universally, which are devoted to higher literary and scientific instruction and to the education of youth, be released from all authority of the Church, from her moderating influence and interference, and subjected wholly to the will of the civil and political authority, [to be conducted] according to the pleasure of the rulers and the standard of the common opinions of the age.

XLVIII. That method of instructing youth can be approved by Catholic men which is separated from the Catholic faith and from the power of the Church, and which has regard exclusively, or at least principally, to a knowledge of natural things only, and to the ends of social life on earth.

XLIX. The civil authority may prevent the bishops and faithful peoples from having free and mutual communication with the Roman pontiff.

L. The lay authority has of itself the right of presenting bishops, and may require of them that they enter on the administration of their dioceses before they receive from the holy see canonical institution and apostolical letters.

LI. The lay government has even the right of deposing bishops from the exercise of their pastoral ministry; nor is it bound to obey the Roman pontiff in those things which concern the establishment of bishoprics and the appointment of bishops.

LII. The government may, in its own right, change the age prescribed by the Church for the religious profession of both women and men, and may forbid religious orders to admit any one to solemn vows without its permission.

LIII. The laws should be abrogated which relate to protecting the condition of the religious orders, and to their rights and duties; nay, the civil government may give assistance to all those who wish to desert their adopted mode of religious life and to break their solemn vows; and in like manner it may altogether abolish the said religious orders and also collegiate churches and simple benefices, even those under the right of a patron, and subject and appropriate their goods and revenues to the administration and free disposal of the civil power.

LIV. Kings and princes are not only exempted from the jurisdiction of the Church, but are also, in deciding questions of jurisdiction, superior to the Church.

LV. The Church ought to be separated from the State, and the State from the Church.

§VII.

ERRORS CONCERNING NATURAL AND CHRISTIAN ETHICS.

LVI. The laws of morality do not need the divine sanction, and it is not at all necessary that human laws be conformed to the law of Nature, or receive from God their obligatory force.

LVII. The science of philosophy and morals, and also the civil laws, may and should deviate from divine and ecclesiastical authority.

LVIII. No other powers are to be recognized but those resting in matter, and all moral discipline and integrity should be applied to accumulating and increasing wealth by every method and to satisfying the desire of pleasure.

LIX. Right consists in the material fact, and all the duties of man are an empty name, and all human deeds have the force of right.

LX. Authority is nothing but numbers and the sum of material forces.

LXI. The successful injustice of a deed brings no detriment to the sanctity of right.

LXII. The so-called principle of non-intervention should be proclaimed and observed.

LXIII. It is allowable to refuse obedience to legitimate princes, and even to rebel against them.

LXIV. The violation of any oath, however sacred, any wicked and flagitious action whatever, repugnant to the eternal law, is not only not to be reprobated, but is altogether permissible, and to be extolled with the highest praise, when it is done for love of country.

§VIII.

ERRORS CONCERNING CHRISTIAN MATRIMONY.

LXV. It can in no way be shown that Christ raised matrimony to the dignity of a sacrament.

LXVI. The sacrament of matrimony is only an accessory to the contract, and separable from it; and the sacrament itself lies in the nuptial benediction alone.

LXVII. According to the law of Nature the bond of matrimony is not indissoluble, and in various cases divorce, properly so-called, may be so sanctioned by the civil authority.

LXVIII. The Church has no power of introducing separatory impediments to marriage, but this power is vested in the civil authority, by which existing impediments may be removed.

LXIX. The Church began in later ages to introduce separatory impediments, not in her own right, but using the right conferred upon her by the civil power.

LXX. The canons of Trent, which inflict the censure of the curse on those who dare to deny the power of the Church to introduce separatory impediments, are either not dogmatical, or are to be understood of that conferred power.

LXXI. The form [of marriage] ordained by the council of Trent is not obligatory, under pain of invalidity, wherever the civil law may prescribe another form, and wills that marriage by this new form shall be valid.

LXXII. Boniface VIII. was the first who asserted that the vow of chastity made at ordination renders marriage null.

LXXIII. By virtue of a purely civil contract a true marriage may subsist between Christians; and it is false either that the contract of marriage between Christians is always a sacrament, or that the contract is null if the sacrament be excluded.

LXXIV. Matrimonial causes and espousals belong by their very nature to the civil courts.

N. B. To this head may be referred two other errors: on the abolition of the celibacy of the clergy, and on preferring the state of marriage to the state of virginity. They are condemned, the former in the Encyclica Qui pluribus, Nov. 9, 1846, the latter in the apostolical letter Multiplices inter, June 10, 1851.

ERRORS CONCERNING THE CIVIL PRINCEDOM OF THE ROMAN PONTIFF.

LXXV. The sons of the Christian and Catholic Church dispute among themselves concerning the compatibility of the temporal with the spiritual kingdom.

LXXVI. The abrogation of the civil power, which the apostolic see possesses, would very greatly conduce to the liberty and felicity of the Church.

N. B. Beside these errors explicitly mentioned, many others are implicitly reprobated in the exposition and assertion of that doctrine concerning the civil princedom of the Roman pontiff, to which all Catholics should most firmly adhere. This doctrine is clearly laid down in the allocution Quibus quantisque, April 20, 1849; in the allocution Si semper antea, May 26, 1850; in the apostolical letter Cum Catholica Ecclesia, March 26, 1860; in the allocution Novos, Sept. 28, 1860; in the allocution Jamdudum, March 18, 1861; in the allocution Maxima quidem, June 9, 1862.

§X.

ERRORS WHICH REFER TO THE LIBERALISM OF THE DAY.

LXXVII. In this our age it is no longer expedient that the Catholic religion should be held to be the only religion of the State, to the exclusion of all other forms of worship.

LXXVIII. Hence it has been laudably provided by law, in certain Catholic countries, that men immigrating there should be permitted the public exercise of their own several forms of worship.

LXXIX. For truly it is false that the civil liberty of every form of worship, and the full power granted to all of openly and publicly declaring all opinions and thoughts whatever, leads to the easier corruption of the morals and minds of peoples, and to the spread of the pest of indifferentism.

LXXX. The Roman pontiff can and ought to reconcile and harmonize himself with progress, with liberalism, and with modern civilization.

[For THE INDEX.]

SPIRITUAL SCIENCE

AS A FACTOR IN THE PROBLEM OF LIFE.

ITS TEACHINGS CONTRASTED WITH ECCLESIASTICAL THEOLOGY—WILL THE PROOF OF IMMORTALITY ACT AS A MORAL AND CIVILIZING FORCE?

(1.) "Mr. Wallace's chapter on the 'Moral Teachings of Spiritualism' . . . . unfolds a metaphysical theory of human nature and destiny, and its supposed influence on human conduct; but it has nothing to say concerning the determination of rights and duties, in which all morality consists."

"As to the claims of Spiritualism to be a true philosophy and a demonstration of immortality, we have no motive for controverting them, but still less for urging them. . . . Our whole work is to hold up the universal claims of freedom, truth, justice, intelligence, virtue, brotherhood; we have nothing to do with any special claims whatever. . . . We wish and mean to be fair to all phases of liberal thought; but this seems to be accomplished by giving a fair and courteous hearing to each."—F. E. ABBOT.

(2.) "This is a paper called THE INDEX. Some one asked me what my opinions were on the subject of religion when I was a young man, to which I replied that he would find them in the Atlantic Monthly for July [1874]. They were almost the same as those given in this paper. This is a paper advocating what is called secularism. It is a paper which takes the ground that we know nothing outside of this life."—ROBERT DALE OWEN, at Lincoln Hall, Philadelphia, June 27, 1874.

(3.) "Mistaking that of which I knew nothing for the unknowable, I was, in common with my co-editors, what is now called a secularist. . . . I sought to persuade myself that our horizon was wisely bounded by the world we live in; and that our earthly duties are better performed because of such a restriction. I have since had occasion to express my conviction that evidence, manifest to the senses, which assures man of a life to come is one of the most cogent among civilizing influences; and that the human race will never attain that wisdom and virtue of which its nature is capable, until the masses shall have reached, not a vague belief, but a living, ever-present assurance, that character and conduct in this world determine our state of being in the next."—ROBERT DALE OWEN, in the Atlantic Monthly for July, 1874.

(4.) "A science of human nature which is founded on observed facts; which appeals only to facts and experiment; which takes no beliefs on trust; which inculcates investigation and self-reliance as the first duties of intelligent beings; which teaches that happiness in a future life can be secured by cultivating and developing to the utmost the higher faculties of our intellectual and moral nature, and by no other method,—is and must be the natural enemy of all superstition. . . . Spiritualism abolishes the terms 'supernatural' and 'miracle' by an extension of the sphere of law and the realm of Nature; and in doing so it takes up and explains whatever is true in the superstitions and so-called miracles of all ages. It, and it alone, is able to harmonize conflicting creeds; and it must ultimately lead to concord among mankind in the matter of religion, which has for so many ages been the source of unceasing discord and incalculable evil; and it will be able to do this because it appeals to evidence instead of faith, and substitutes facts for opinions, and is thus able to demonstrate the source of much of the teaching that men have so often held to be divine. . . . Spiritualism is no mere 'physiological' curiosity, no mere indication of some hitherto unknown 'law of Nature;' but it is a science of vast extent, having the widest, the most important, and the most practical issues, and as such should enlist the sympathies alike of moralists, philosophers, and politicians, and of all who have at heart the improvement of society, and the permanent elevation of human nature."—A. R. WALLACE, Defence of Modern Spiritualism.

(5.) "Human character is an expression or reflection of what? Not of abstract doctrines and speculative beliefs, but of inherited peculiarities, of surrounding influences and education, of temptations, struggles, obstacles, defeats, and victories, which have been appropriated from time to time by the ever-irrepressible feelings and faculties of thought. . . . Character and conduct are exact expressions of the conditions and the circumstances at the moment positively prevailing. Preach the holiest gospel to the poor and famishing; describe the glittering robes of angels to the ragged and freezing beggars, and they will have no ears to hear or heart to enjoy. . . . Pray, persuade, exhort, expostulate, lose your patience, and threaten eternal sufferings indescribable as penalties of disobedience; and the result is (as eighteen hundred and fifty-nine years of Orthodox preaching have amply demonstrated) that human character and daily life will continue to correspond, in the main, not to your holy precepts and enforced forms of faith, but to the structure of the social mould into which the infant and child was cast from the day it took flesh and began practically to dwell among men. . . . The world's religious history shows that no theory of a future existence has ever exerted half the influence upon humanity that has emanated from government and the sphere of physical circumstances. . . . Upon an examination and average estimate of the human world, I have come to this conclusion: that fifty per cent. of individual conduct is attributable to physical organization; add to this thirty per cent. from the sphere of circumstances swaying judgment and conscience, and ten per cent. from educational bias, and we have left ten per cent. of influence attributable to the action of the other world upon men. . . . Until the objective verities of Spiritualism became known, the hope of eternal personal existence was enveloped in doubts many and painful. . . . The moral value of phenomenal Spiritualism is apparent in the demonstration it furnishes of immortal life. . . . But in the great work of human culture and redemption, all intelligent minds depend (not upon any marvels or spiritual communications, but) upon what may here be termed Philosophical Spiritualism. What does this side of the question teach? It teaches by the laws of cause and effect, by clairvoyance in the thinking faculties, and by reasonings intuitive and correspondential, that omnipresent and immutable progress is Heaven's first law; . . . that all religions, creeds, sects, theories of man, laws, institutions, and governments, are of human origin, and indicate the wants of the age and the status of the different minds in which they appeared; that man's only infallible authority, or 'rule of faith and practice,' is the divine Light which ever shines in the highest faculties of his mental organization; that in proportion as man's affections become refined and his thoughts harmoniously exalted, so, in the same proportion, will the world be visited with holier conceptions of God, with sentiments of brotherhood more sacred, and with contemplations of the universe more enlarged and worthy. . . . Philosophical Spiritualism is a revelation of divine Principles, of the living laws of truth which impose wholesome self-restraint upon the individual; making each the Palladium of his own progressive prosperity. . . . Morally considered, I know of no theory of the after-existence or of this life that is more, or as much, calculated to stimulate the intellect and exalt the innate affections."—A. J. DAVIS, Harmonial Series, Vol. V.

(6.) "The pure precepts of the great thinkers of the past will remain forever: they rest on the eternal foundation of man's relationship to man, and cannot perish. But their interpretations may be false, we may misunderstand them, or new light may give to them a wholly different meaning. Spiritualism may interfere with many darling beliefs of the churches, but never with their truth. . . . It asks nothing without giving a reason; teaches nothing without giving a cause. . . . There has been cant enough, quite, about morals: what is wanted is knowledge. Give man that, and his morals will be right. His demand is not for a revelation embodied in a book, to be expounded by a hierarchy allied with mystery, with partiality for a privileged few; but a system meeting the wants of the people, entering directly into their social, intellectual, moral, and political lives. . . . Spiritualism is the philosopher's highest conception of his relations to the spiritual universe, his fellow-men, spirits; the living thought of the age, ultimating not in the perfection of religion, but in intellectual superiority, which goes onward, and rounds the character in moral completeness."—HUDSON TUTTLE, Arcana of Spiritualism.

The great or underlying claim of Spiritualism, or spiritual science, is that the life of the individual does not end with the dissolution of the physical or terrestrial body. The special claims of this science include certain facts regarding man's spiritual nature, and the development of startling natural powers in the individual, which bear directly upon historical records of similar powers in ages past which are claimed by many to have been supernatural or superhuman. No one who expects to wage a successful war against error and superstition, to the end that humanity may be elevated, can afford to remain in doubt regarding the truth or error of the above claims.

The backbone of ecclesiastical theology consists in the alleged miracles and superhuman nature of Jesus of Nazareth. It matters not how many in the Christian ranks but half believe their own professed dogmas; there are yet left tens of thousands of earnest, sincere souls in those ranks, who will cling to old ideas until some palpable proof shall come to them of the error of ecclesiastical claims.

There is a bridge over which the whole Christian Church is preparing to cross. That bridge will carry them from the uncertain quicksands of old theology, in which they have been floundering for generations past, to the solid ground of that science which proclaims "the extension of the sphere of law and the realm of Nature, and in doing so takes up and explains whatever is true in the superstitions and so-called miracles of all ages."

In vain does the reformer, unaided, proclaim the errors of old theories. Something has held and will hold the masses to their old ideas, until a demonstration to the senses shall thoroughly arouse them, and the scales shall fall from their eyes.

In the quotation from Mr. Owen, we have the frank confession from one who has passed the age of three-score years, and who, but for his experience in spiritual phenomena, would doubtless have retained to this day the ideas and beliefs which, he tells us, governed his utterances through the larger portion of his life.

But individual experience fails to carry conviction to another. All investigators unite with Mr. Wallace in saying that "men must satisfy themselves by their own persevering researches, and not expect to have proofs laid before them."

Many are deterred from a careful investigation of Spiritualism under the erroneous idea that it leads to free love. Very little reading of standard works upon Spiritualism would scatter all such false impressions, for the best writers on the subject declare this free-love insanity to be a horrible, snake-like parasite, which attempts to entwine itself about every prominent growth in Nature until shaken off. The great body of Spiritualists regard it with loathing. Social science should take up such matters, with a decent regard to laws physiological and psychological clearly established. This has not been done as yet, no intelligent reference to such laws having been made by the advocates of free love. It has been one shout for unbridled license to the passions.

Sexualism, or free-lovism, is no more a part of Spiritualism than are Catholicism, Mormonism, Calvinism, Republicanism, woman suffrage, or labor-reform; and it is left for "independent" Orthodox papers that fatten on advertising contracts of Credit Mobilier stock and Freedmen's Bureau jobs to attempt to identify Spiritualism with free love. Examine the writings upon spiritual science of such men as Profs. Hare, Crookes, Varley, Wallace, and others. They have failed to discover that this science teaches free love. Examine the declaration of principles published in THE INDEX of Aug. 20, a declaration endorsed by the great body of Spiritualists in Europe and America; is free love found there?

Psychological facts which spiritual science proclaims will undoubtedly lead in time to a modification of marriage laws; but any repealing of those laws would bring destruction to the home circle, around which our holiest memories cluster. The very thought of such a possibility is abhorrent to the majority of Spiritualists.

In the article alluded to in THE INDEX of Aug. 20, I have coupled "natural morality" with Spiritualism; to this the editor takes a kindly exception. I find myself too much in sympathy with him in his valuable efforts to place morality itself upon a scientific basis, to believe that I differ at all from him in the central idea.

The ethics of THE INDEX I find wonderfully in harmony with the teachings of Spiritualism. So much of Spiritualism as is true, coming from Nature, must be a valuable element, a factor for use in the problem of natural morality. The extension of life beyond this little globe, as well as the proof that our condition in the after life "depends not upon arbitrary decree or special prevision, but on character, and personal conformity to universal and divine law," gives dignity, aim, and force to existence itself. Anything which elevates the mind, giving larger views of the universe, must give tone and shape to character. Not simply a knowledge of rights, duties, and relations is necessary, but a rational and exalted conception of the infinite possibilities implied by extended and progressive life is also necessary to give effect to the former.

If natural morality is "the sum-total of moral relations as they really ought to be in themselves," and our knowledge of or search for such harmonious relations is "a progressive science," those relations then, in perfection, must be to us for ages yet an unknown—not unknowable—quantity. If the product of the problem changes not, but only our conception of what that true answer should be, how important that every factor which Nature offers should be taken into the count! Leave out important factors in an algebraical problem, and the product which x equals will be incorrect. Is it any safer to leave the facts of Spiritualism out of life's problem? Perhaps we have relations which some moralists dream not of; namely, with spiritual beings; and possibly a well-behaved spirit has "rights" which a materialist or secularist is bound to respect.

I speak for the rights of truths proclaimed by earnest, intelligent investigators, among whom, Mr. Wallace tells us, are "clergymen of all sects, literary men and lawyers, physicians in large numbers, men of science not a few, secularists, philosophical sceptics, and pure materialists, who have become converts through the overwhelming logic of the phenomena which Spiritualism has brought them."

Who knows but that it may, a generation hence, be considered immoral to call the spirit of your great-grandfather "unconscious cerebration," simply because it would be untrue; and "was truthfulness ever anything but a virtue in itself?" What an awful warning to wicked unbelievers!

But let us now turn to the teachings of spiritual science, and compare them with that of the old theology, that we may get some idea of the vast revolution in thought and act which the spiritual theory will bring when once accepted by mankind.

And first, why should the old theories of life and a future state have had so little effect (and doubtless that little not for good); the quotation from Mr. Davis giving an estimate of but one-tenth of combined influences?

Mankind were outraged by the charge that they were totally depraved. Did you never notice the effect upon a boy who has reached the age of eight or nine years, when told rudely that he was thoroughly bad; motives, instincts, acts, all bad; and that he had rather do wrong than right? If the poor child had ordinary intelligence and spirit (a natural spirit), his face would show a strange mixture of incredulity, resentment, defiance, desperation, hopelessness, varying with the mould or structure of the organism from which that little spirit looked out. That face tells you as plainly as words can say, "It is an outrage, sir, and you know you don't believe half you say." Note the instant change in that little face when the fault, kindly pointed out, is referred to as unworthy of one capable of so much that is good, and the child is made intelligently to understand what was wrong in his act, and what injury and suffering it might cause to himself and others.

Mankind under the old theories of life were credited with not one good act. "The carnal heart was at enmity with God, deceitful above all things and desperately wicked." Possibly there was a future; no absolute proof of it; and if there was, was it for them? Could any act of theirs make them better here, or insure happiness in continued existence? How about predestination, imputed righteousness, salvation by blood, and kindred dogmas? Were they calculated to call out the higher qualities in man,—self-reliance, courage, effort, hope?

> "Should my zeal no languor know,
> This for sin could not atone;
> Thou must save, and Thou alone."

Therefore let all zeal languish; perish all attempts at self-improvement; it will avail nothing; such righteousness would be but filthy rags; therefore down on your knees, with your hand upon your mouth, and your mouth in the dust.

What wonder that such possibilities of a hereafter failed to elevate humanity when taught to believe that absolution could be received when this life's journey was ended. It was enough to check the spiritual element of growth, and cause a temporary arrest of development.

How different is the teaching of spiritual science! Here man finds the order of Nature, cause and effect, in full operation. Instead of the retrograde movement implied by the doctrine of the "Fall of Man," we find progression the great central idea, and learn that every man is his own savior. Not simply saving himself from future ills, but, by constant study of the harmonies of Nature, to learn how, day by day, to attune himself to Nature's touch, that he may be to himself and to all about him, not an instrument for discordant sounds, but for the true, pure notes of the universe.

He sees sickness and suffering all about him, but he talks no more about "the mysterious dispensations of Providence." Ignorance, not sin, has brought false combinations together. The very laws of Nature that bring him suffering "are big with mercy," when used aright. Is it reasonable to wish that we might escape all suffering? What does progression imply? It implies "a worse and a better—the worse in the past, the better in the future; in other words, there must, as a general rule, be comparative evil behind us, and comparative good to come. Thus only do we obtain a glimpse towards a rational theory of evil. For, though we may desire unmixed good in worldly affairs and unmixed truth in spiritual revealings, both are unreasonable wishes. Witness our consciousness that our best happiness consists in sustained efforts, from darkness to approach the light, from evil gradually to attain unto good, and from error to climb the pleasant paths of truth, as these open to more and more excellent knowledge. . . . Man's moral and intellectual wants find full satisfaction only in a progressive state. Finality is stagnation, a paradise for the sluggard only."—Debatable Land.

Not against dogmatic Orthodoxy alone does spiritual science wage perpetual war, but against dogmatic materialism as well.

Some Spiritualist writer has said, "Sceptical materialism, which honestly waits for evidence, is very different from dogmatic materialism, which closes the mind against evidence."

Dr. Büchner has never seen an instance of clairvoyance; hence he dogmatically declares that to be impossible which has been attested to by men who are his peers in science. Dr. Büchner "confesses that the thought of the possibility of a future state of existence would be unendurable, horrible to him." I cannot regard such utterances worth repeating, except to show what Wallace calls "that partial mental paralysis, the result of a century of materialistic thought, which renders so many men unable seriously to conceive the possibility of a natural continuation of human life after the death of the body." Büchner does not wish to go to an Orthodox heaven, and have a Presbyterian clergyman whining about him; and, as he knows of no other hereafter, he prefers not to go hence.

Those who are indifferent to a hereafter may say they are happy, and honestly think so; but they cannot be really in love with Nature; they are only smitten.

Why did John Stuart Mill, of whom it is said, "he died without fear of death, and without hope of heaven," say, after the death of his wife: "Since then, I have sought for such alleviation as my state admitted of, by the mode of life which most enables me to feel her still near me. . . . Her memory is to me a religion, and her approbation the standard by which, summing up all worthiness, I endeavor to regulate my life"? Mill had no proof of immortality; and with the full force of his powerful intellect and discipline he brought himself to a quiet resignation to whatever the future might bring. There is something beautiful in this; but was there no pang in the thought that he might not again meet her whom he so truly loved? And if the memory of the loved could be "a religion" to one like Mill, and he could long to feel the presence near him, how much more will the proof of the presence of the loved and pure be a hallowed influence to all! Such relations may give us no further information regarding rights and duties; but they will act as an attractive and cohesive power, drawing us to the things that are right in themselves.

Humanity will not, like drilled soldiers, fall into line at the word that indicates their duties, nor are noble incentives unworthy of a true humanity. One who moves like a machine, void of enthusiasm, ready stoically to resign his being to dumb forgetfulness,— may be truly moral in his relations to his fellowmen; but does he represent the highest type of manhood? To such will the remembrance of a loved parent come in the midst of busy life as the calendar notes the date of that loved one's birth or death? That severe discipline which brings indifference to future life must be antagonistic to those noble aspirations which are the mainspring of progress. Will that man build half so truly, or enjoy his labor half so well, who believes that instant endless night is the portion of all humanity?

> "Nor cast one longing lingering look behind,"—

Mr. Epes Sargent, in his very interesting work upon the "Proof Palpable of Immortality," says: "There are those who, in order to magnify the moral element in our nature, would have us rest apathetic in regard to all physical evidences of a future life. According to these writers, it is only a coarse realism that seeks for palpable proofs. Kant tells us that the disinterested nature of our morality is impaired, if we give to our actions for end the perspective of immortality."

The moralist after Kant's own heart must have some motive for action; shall we call it a love for humanity which prompts a recognition of the rights of fellow-men? There may be a love, an enthusiasm for humanity to which men like Kant were utter strangers; a love and labor that tires not within the limit of a century, but, "beating in rhythm to the music of the glorious whole," cannot complacently lay all aside and say, "Annihilation is my heaven."

Alas! The morals of this age sadly need to be "impaired by the perspective of immortality." It is high time that men knew beyond a shadow of a doubt that it does make a difference how they behave in their relations to their fellow-men.

If the teachings of such men as Kant on the one hand, and dogmatic Orthodoxy on the other, have brought us the present crop of morals, then is it clear that a change is necessary; and I believe, with Mr. Owen, that "evidence manifest to the senses, which assures man of a life to come, is one of the most cogent among civilizing influences."

In placing morals upon a scientific basis, Mr. Abbot has rendered invaluable service to humanity. This science, like the roots and branches of a tree, will feel their way out and absorb all truth, no matter from what quarter, the truths of Spiritualism giving their nourishment in turn. The universal claims of freedom, justice, and brotherhood are upheld, vitalized, and perpetuated by the facts and philosophy of Spiritualism.

To know the right is but half; the moral force to do the right must come from a calm, rational, spiritual elevation of thought and purpose—no revival excitement or insane exultation over a supposed escape from some Orthodox hell, a psychological excitement bereft of all reason, but a solid comfort and settled purpose which comes from higher and truer conceptions of the great problem of life.

Even the secularist loses his title by the loss of those distinctive lines that separated him from those who, once a week, taught the people regarding matters deemed especially holy; for the teachings of Spiritualism, leaving nothing untouched, esteeming nothing too holy or hallowed for rigid inspection, brings to the understanding and into the daily life of even the wayfaring man, life-giving, soul-stirring truths. The merchant, farmer, lawyer, and mechanic wait not for some returning Lord's day to think of such matters, but the clear, ringing utterances of spiritual science take hold of their daily lives; its developments are no more holy to them than the developments of the telegraph, the camera, or the spectroscope. For all things which Nature gives to them are sacred, nothing unclean or common; the poorest gift of Nature not to be despised; the richest gift, even life forevermore, not a vague possibility, but a free, full, generous gift, meeting aspirations which Nature herself implanted in humanity. For if the fundamental claim of Spiritualism is true, and immortality a fact (and the burden of proof now rests with those who make the objection), then are all these aspirations natural to the spirit of man; and the assertion that they are untrustworthy, pure speculation unsupported by evidence, is "sound and smoke shrouding the glow of heaven!"

Poetry.

[For THE INDEX.]

CHRISTMAS EVE.

All rare delights of field and garden-place,
The hawthorn spray that veils the blue-bird's wing,
The apple-blooms' pink shower through sunny space,
The myriad fleeting pleasures of the spring,
We seek in vain through dark December days;
While to the time they were fond memory strays.

The summer noons in verdant woodland shade,
The mind by some sweet poet's thought entranced,
While the mild breeze with leaves and branches played,
And o'er the page the flickering shadows danced,
The summer night's calm spell that moonlight throws,—
These come not now amid December snows.

The strange, rich tapestry that autumn wrought,
And flung with lavish hand o'er all the scene,
Has faded quite; when we its glories sought,
The grim hills mocked us with their silent mien,
No fragrant orchard or vine-breath we find
In the chill greeting of December's wind.

Fair out-door wonders vanish from our path,
Nor our entreaties strong can keep them here;
But blithe December holds the Christmas hearth,
And loving hearts, and tidings of good cheer.
The seasons gone—we would not call them back;
December holds what all the others lack.

The happy Christmas festival shall bind
In closer sympathy all human hearts,
Quicken each generous impulse, help us find
Our sweetest care in doing well our parts;
So with high hopes and deep content we weave December's holly round this Christmas eve.

POSTAGE NOTICE.

Subscribers will hereafter please remit twenty cents for a year's postage in advance to THE INDEX office, instead of paying this sum to their local post-offices as heretofore.

THE LATEST ethical discovery is that a denominational list of ministers must be "honest," but that a denominational list of societies is under no such necessity.

PROFESSOR C. D. FARLIN delivered an address on "The Demands of Liberalism" before the Jefferson County Liberal League, at Watertown, New York, on November 1, 1874, and repeated it by special request on November 29. The address has been published in pamphlet form, and indicates a clear comprehension of the duty of the hour.

THE Philadelphia Christian Statesman disclaims all connection with the American Railway Literary Union, a full account of which was published in THE INDEX of December 3. But this organization and the Christian Amendment association both grow out of the same intolerant ideas; and the fact of their not being technically connected does not change the fact that they aim substantially at kindred objects.

THE LISTS of names so kindly sent in by different friends of THE INDEX, for the purpose of giving information to guide the distribution of specimen numbers of the paper, have been exceedingly useful, and proved the means of securing many new subscribers. All such lists are gratefully received, and sample copies are always sent to the parties named. The more lists, the more subscribers; so please send the names of all whom you think likely to be interested in the ideas represented by THE INDEX.

WE HAVE just learned that the "Liberal League of Jefferson County," New York, was organized in May, 1873, with about twenty charter members; and that its membership roll at present has about one hundred and fifty names. Its officers are as follows: L. D. Olney, President; Mrs. Julia A. Smith, Vice President; Wm. A. Howland, Recording Secretary; Miss Laura M. Delano, Corresponding Secretary; J. W. Nott, Treasurer; Wm. O. Smith, Mrs. M. S. Day, Mrs. Aspinwall, E. D. Moore, and Oscar T. Greene, Executive Committee.

THE very able pamphlet of Mr. Gladstone on The Vatican Decrees in their Bearing on Civil Allegiance, of which sixteen thousand copies are reported to have been sold in London in the short space of five days, though at the high price of half a crown, is a significant indication of the profound religious fermentation now going on throughout Christendom. The ancient English Catholic families, if Lord Acton and Lord Camoys represent them, seem ripe for the Old Catholic movement; and Mr. Gladstone's manifesto may yet give rise to events of national importance. It revives the interest excited by the famous Encyclical and Syllabus of Pius Ninth, which we therefore republish this week for the benefit of our readers, and which ought to be carefully read as a summary of the ideas openly denounced as heresies by the infallible Pope. Mr. Gladstone's pamphlet, together with the replies of Archbishop Manning and Lord Acton, will be mailed from this office on receipt of thirty cents.

THE CHRISTIANIZERS IN COUNCIL.

The "National Association for Securing a Religious [Christian] Amendment of the United States Constitution" held a public convention in this city on the evenings of December 16 and 17, in Tremont Temple. The hall is a very large one, and was not filled at either session; but the audience was respectable in point of numbers. Judging by the applause, which was frequent and sometimes vigorous, the general sentiment was in favor of the objects proposed by the holders of the convention; though now and then a little sporadic clapping at the wrong place showed that there were a few irrepressible dissenters present who would have done better by preserving a decorous quiet. Rev. Dorus Clarke, D. D., was chosen temporary, and Charles G. Nazro, Esq., permanent chairman. Addresses were made by Rev. D. McAllister, General Secretary of the Association; by Mr. Nazro; by President Joseph Cummings, of Wesleyan University; by Rev. Dr. Miner, President of Tufts College; by Dr. William R. Clark, of Charlestown; and by Rev. F. E. Tower, of Allston. The following resolutions were adopted without even a pretence of discussion:—

WHEREAS, This nation was founded by Christians, who incorporated the principles of Christianity into the institutions of the country; and

WHEREAS, Unsectarian Christianity has always been a part of our common law; and

WHEREAS, Our written National Constitution, though made for a Christian people, is destitute of any explicit acknowledgment of God or Christianity, which defect is made the pretext for the most dangerous assaults on the Christian institutions and usages of our nation; therefore

Resolved, That the connection which has hitherto existed, and still exists, in fact, between our government and Christianity, now demands expression in our fundamental law.

Resolved, That such an expression and authentication of the connection of our government with Christianity is now required fully and explicitly to harmonize our National Constitution with our State Constitutions, with our common law and the Christian usages of our civil life.

Resolved, That this recognition of Christianity in the National Constitution does not involve a union of Church and State, but rather the opposite, since it enables the nation to express its own relations to Christianity without the intervention of any church organization.

Resolved, That as the Christian institutions of this nation do not infringe upon the rights of any class of citizens, but are the bulwark and the safeguard of all rights, the securing for these institutions an explicit legal basis in our fundamental law can be in no manner intolerant or proscriptive.

Resolved, That this Constitutional recognition of the connection of our government with Christianity is necessary—not to sustain the Christian religion, but to aid in preserving and maintaining the Christian institutions and usages of our nation.

Resolved, That, recognizing the importance of this subject, we pledge ourselves to present and advocate it until the nation, by the voice of the people, shall declare its Christian character as it has already asserted its freedom, in the charter of our rights and liberties.

The most noteworthy declaration of the convention was made by President Cummings, and, as it ought to be on record in these columns, we quote the whole of his speech as briefly reported in the Boston Journal of December 17:—

"He declared that the essential law of nations was not founded upon conceded rights, but upon God's law. Some infidels, relying upon the negative character of the Constitution of this country, had set up a claim to the right of protection in their belief. He emphatically denied this. No man had any right to be an infidel, and no infidel had a right to any protection in the expression of his sentiments. If he attempted to propagate any ideas tending to subvert society—that is, Christian society,—he ought to be crushed like a viper! We must recognize God in the spirit of our laws or else they will not stand, and he saw no objection to recognizing him in their letter."

The Daily Advertiser of the same date reported his speech as follows:—

"President Joseph Cummings, of Wesleyan University, made an address on 'The Influence of the Perversion of Truth in regard to the Connection of Religion and State.' After going somewhat into the history of the union of Church and State in various ages, he spoke of the infidel theory that government rested on conceded rights. Infidels had claimed that they had the same rights under our government that Christian men had; were entitled to the same protection for their principles and practices. But what was the basis of all this? As God was the author of all right, and to deny this was to deny the existence of God, no man had the right to be an infidel or an atheist. No man, on these principles, had any right for protection for his principles that were calculated to disorganize society, and had brought ruin wherever they had been announced. Law should interfere where a man's doings corrupted others. A man might be an infidel alone by himself, and take delight in sinking himself to the nature of a beast, if he chose; he might stand alone at night in darkness and blaspheme God. He had no right to do this, but society had no right to interfere. But if he was to go forth to teach principles that were calculated to corrupt and destroy good public morals, then society should try him as a criminal. In closing he spoke at length of the beneficent effect upon the character of the people a recognition of God in the national Constitution would have."

Such sentiments need only to be put on record, as showing the real bearings of the Christian Amendment movement on freedom of speech and of the press. If the other advocates of this measure disapprove them, they must explicitly disavow them; silence will be properly construed as assent.

But the speech which evinced the greatest degree of intellectual and moral force was the opening address of Rev. David McAllister, permanent General Secretary of the Association, who spoke with that tone of deep conviction and sustained enthusiasm which, wherever or whenever or in whatever cause we hear it, invariably impresses us with profound respect for the speaker. Our companions shared our own opinion of the ability and earnestness of Mr. McAllister, which are very imperfectly represented in the subjoined report of the Advertiser:—

"He said the great object of the movement was to assert the Christian character of the nation, and to express it in the fundamental law. The Christian character of the land could hardly be doubted when we examined the records of our early history. The country was settled by Christians who incorporated the principles of their Christianity into all the institutions they built up. At the time of making the Constitution all the States acknowledged Christianity. Even the compact entered into by the early settlers of Rhode Island contained all the points that it was desired to insert in the national constitution, an acknowledgment of the supremacy of Jehovah, of the rule of Jesus Christ as King of kings and Lord of lords, and the supreme authority of the word of God as the fountain of law and as the source of all principles of right. He then spoke of the union of Church and State, saying that the old union, as it was understood, was not desired. It now meant that the Church and State should be separate from each other, as distinct institutions; but still, as the State had moral functions and sought moral ends, that it should acknowledge God as the law-giver. Christianity was a part of the law of the land, and had been so decided again and again by the courts. We desired to maintain our Christian character in the old institutions of our fathers. He spoke of the attack upon the custom of reading the Bible in the public schools and the religious observance of the Sabbath, saying that the assailants found support in the Constitution of the United States, while they were condemned by the Constitution of every State. He thought it had come to this, that one must abandon the Christian features of our national life and act upon the principle that this nation must have no connection with religion whatever, or else make the Constitution just as truly Christian as the government was. The government in its administration should correspond to the written Constitution. What the friends of this movement desired was to protect the fundamental Christian institutions of the land; and to do this they meant to have the subject discussed. They did not want any words put into the Constitution till they should be put there as the embodiment of the vital convictions of the American people."

Nothing could be more apparent, to one who intelligently followed the argument from its own premises, than that this movement expresses at once the moral and the political necessities of Christianity in this country. It is not a question of words, but rather a question of the vital interests of great institutions. Christianity must either relinquish its present hold on the government,—its Sunday laws, its blasphemy laws, its thanksgivings and fasts, its chaplaincies, its Bible in schools, and so forth,—or else it must secure the necessary condition of retaining all these things by inserting some guarantee of their perpetuity in the National Constitution. Looking simply at the small present dimensions of the movement,—at the fewness of its devoted workers, the paucity of attendants at this convention, and the indifference of the public at large,—one is justified in dismissing it from consideration as of immediate importance. But whoever is qualified to detect great movements in their germs, and to perceive that instituted Christianity is in vast peril from the constant inroads of rapidly spreading disbelief of dogmatic Christianity,—whoever is able to discern the certainty that the claims of Christianity to mould political action in its own interest must sooner or later be submitted for adjudication to the supreme law of the land, by which they are not even verbally recognized,—will not fall into the superficiality of inferring the future fortunes of this movement either from the mediæval character of its pretensions or the present insignificance of its success. It may possibly be that the Christian churches do not really care for their own existence and are prepared to surrender it without a struggle; but we do not so read history. So soon as they come to comprehend fully the fact that their legal "Sabbath," their Bible in schools, and all their present legal privileges, must one by one slip away inevitably from their grasp, unless they defend them in the only possible way by grounding them on Constitutional guarantees, it seems to us an irresistible conclusion from history and experience that they will rouse themselves to protect these possessions as infinitely important. If they do not, they have achieved a degree of moral rottenness, cowardice, and hypocrisy which we are very slow to attribute to them. These champions of a Christianized Constitution are to-day the POLITICAL BRAIN of the Christian Church. Conceding their premises, which are simply those of the universal Evangelical communion, it is impossible to deny their conclusions. It is these premises that we dispute—not the logicalness of the conclusions themselves; and although we hold that the same premises, if further carried out, must lead to the Roman Catholic position expressed by the Vatican decrees, we none the less admit the necessity of travelling that road from the starting-point, if it is once fairly entered upon. Hence we are as strongly convinced as ever that the Christian Amendment movement contains the germ of a demand that must sooner or later be heard asserted with perilous emphasis by the great body of Orthodox Christian churches.

HORTICULTURAL HALL LECTURES---1875.

A CIRCULAR.

The Committee of the Free Religious Association in charge of the Horticultural Hall Lectures on Sunday afternoons again invite the friends interested in maintaining these lectures, either for their own or for others' sake, to contribute the money necessary for the purpose. It is believed that, from winter to winter, such friends will be glad to join in offering the course, as their gift, free to the public. Their speakers—whose names and subjects will be found below,—in receiving but thirty dollars for a carefully prepared essay, are themselves the largest contributors. The whole expenses for this winter, including the hall, &c., will be about seven hundred dollars. Money sent to any one of the undersigned committee will be gratefully acknowledged:—

RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, 139 Federal St., Boston.
HANNAH E. STEVENSON, 32 Mt. Vernon St., Boston.
CHARLES K. WHIPPLE, 19 Pinckney St., Boston.

PRINCIPLES AND PROPERTY.

Some question concerning money often presents a severer test of fidelity to conviction than any other. What havoc financial temptations are making in the domain of moral character, in this our day, we all know but too well. But faithfulness to mental convictions is not infrequently tested in the same way, and found wanting. And the inquiry is often raised, whether the most pronounced advocates of mental liberty would remain true to their principles under certain supposed circumstances, where vested rights in property should be involved. This class of liberals have not, as a general thing, any proprietary rights of the kind supposed, and so a hypothetical case has to be made for them. But they ought to be ready to meet the hypothesis.

When, for instance, liberals in religion complain, as they sometimes do and justly, that they are deprived of a fair share of funds that have been invested in liberal religious institutions, because free inquiry has carried them somewhat further in opinion than it has those who chance to control the funds, the retort is made that if these same liberals were to raise money for the advancement of their views of mental liberty, and, under their free conditions of fellowship, persons should get control of the funds who would use them for propagating very different views, or if those to whose care the funds should be first committed should, using their mental freedom, change their opinions to something quite opposite, and use the funds to advance their changed views, the original donors of the money would be the first and foremost to complain of violated faith and trust. If any of us have complained that a minister of a Unitarian society, for no want of ability or defect of character, but for coming, by the free use of his mind, to a more rationalistic theology, has been deprived of his pulpit, the answer has been given: Suppose that Theodore Parker, after he had been instated in the Boston Music Hall as preacher, had changed his views to Calvinism, would his society have continued to hear him preach and to raise money for his support? If any of us have ventured to say that it seemed to us that money bequeathed for the aid of young men preparing for the ministry, with no theological condition expressed but that they should be "Protestants," ought not to be withheld from a young man, otherwise worthy to receive it, because he cannot conscientiously call himself a "Christian," it has been replied: If the editor of THE INDEX should be converted to Christianity, and become a very Orthodox Christian, and should convert the paper which the money of liberals has established into a propagandist of his new views, how many of its stockholders would continue to pay their assessments, or of its subscribers would continue to take it? And lately, when a church established as Unitarian Christian was shut against the preaching of natural theism, and the act was declared a violation of Unitarian principles, the responsive inquiry was raised whether if, in the course of events, the proprietors of the Paine Memorial Hall, now building in Boston, were to become zealots of some Christian sect, they would be justified in converting it into sectarian uses, and nobody have any right to complain.

Now at first sight these suppositions may seem fairly to meet the cases in question. But a little examination will show their logical defect. The cases in which liberals have complained of any grievance are all cases in which institutions or funds have been devoted, if not wholly to the principles of religious liberty, at least to religious objects, under an expressed and emphasized trust in those principles, and in which also, under the operation of these principles, there has been a gradual change and progress in religious views; and the point of their complaint is that the present custodians of such institutions or funds undertake to say where shall be the limit of this trust and progress. But the hypothetical cases are all cases in which money raised expressly and exclusively for the service of the principles of religious liberty is wrested suddenly from this purpose, and devoted to the propagandism of opinions in direct opposition to such principles. Here, certainly, are differences so wide as to destroy all parallelism in the suppositions, and to nullify whatever force of argument they were thought to possess. If funds have been given to churches or schools expressly for the upholding of certain theological views, as has sometimes been the case, then liberals make no complaint, so long as they do not hold the prescribed theology, of being unjustly deprived of the benefit of such funds. Nor would true liberals complain if a religious society, organized primarily for the inculcation of principles of moral and spiritual character and only secondarily for the inculcation of theology, should cease to support a minister who, in the interest of either a conservative or a radical theology, should reverse this order, and put forth constantly and dogmatically his own theological opinions as first in importance. What they do and should complain of is that funds committed absolutely or primarily to the principles of free inquiry in religion should be diverted from their purpose to any sectarian or dogmatic use, or should be arrested in their function at certain limits of inquiry by the act of those whose own inquiry has stopped at that limit.

But suppose the change of views to be effected, not by abandoning the principles of free thought, but by pursuing those principles; or, to put the strongest possible case, suppose that free thought should, in the future, lead the successors of the present proprietors of the Paine Memorial Hall to the adoption of Calvinism or of Romanism,—would liberals abide by their principles of freedom, and rest content to see the property then go into the service of either of these faiths? The hypothesis is well-nigh absurd enough to be debarred from all consideration; but we will suppose it possible that the very freedom of reason, which the present builders of the Paine Hall proclaim as their one article of belief, should at some time develop the system of Calvinism or the Papacy. What then? Why, when that time shall come, if come it should, the free reason of the liberals of that age will certainly see that this development is legitimate and true, and accept it without complaint. What is really the natural and genuine result of free inquiry, whatever it be, the free reason will unhesitatingly adopt. But in such a radical and absolute change of opinion as is here supposed, the element of time is all-important. Should Calvinists or Romanists, through the fact that no theological test debars them, now seek, otherwise than by fair purchase, to get control of the proprietorship of the Hall for the purpose of converting it to their uses, the act would be condemned by the entire moral sense of the community, of whatever religious opinions, as a fraud and swindle. In no legitimate way could it be thus wrested suddenly from the intent of its builders. And the common honor and trust among men must be accepted as sufficient security against any such attempt. If these are not sufficient, nothing can be. But if either of these faiths, through the natural evolution of religious thought under the full operation of the principle of mental liberty, should come into possession of the Paine property in the lapse of four or five centuries—and it would require at least that length of time for the Paine commemorators and the Boston Investigator to travel by the way of reason to Genevan Calvinism or to Papal Infallibility,—the result would be quietly accepted as in harmony with the general progress of things, and would shock nobody's conscience or faith. If Calvinism or Romanism, by sheer exercise of power, arrests a gift commited to the principle of religious liberty, and turns it to the benefit of its own ecclesiastic dogmas, the act is spoliation. And the act does not essentially change its character if it be committed by a more liberal faith. But if Calvinism, or Romanism, or any other denominational creed, shall be the legitimate offspring of free thought, then it will be the lawful heir of all the material possessions of free thought, and liberals will be ready to recognize the ownership. Yet so small is the probability that the law of evolution in religious thought will work in that way, that present liberals and their descendants may be reasonably sure that they will be able to keep both their principles and their property. ARE THERE ANY CHRISTIANS?

Christianity has a two-fold basis,—the dogmatic and the practical. Jesus Christ was a teacher, and he was a reformer. The body of believers who have taken his name have preferred him in the first capacity rather than the second. They have builded their Church far more on the dogmatic element in Christ's religion than on the practical. Historically, beyond all question, Christianity has had for its basis the dogmas which Jesus taught instead of the religion which he lived and practised. Christians have been very swift and eager to call their master "Lord," but on the whole they have been very slow and awkward in doing what he set them the example in. They have been willing to die for his doctrine, but they have not been so willing to live his life.

Now a man is known by his emphasis. We are all so much alike, that we are differentiated to sight only by what we lay stress upon. One man is scarcely to be distinguished from another, except as here and there we see one fling himself with tremendous energy after some specific aim, or appear to be dominated by some all-absorbing purpose.

In considering, then, who are Christians, — or, rather, who are Christ-like,—it is pertinent to inquire on what Jesus most put his emphasis. I have said that he was both teacher and reformer; but in which character did he exhibit the highest and best-sustained enthusiasm? Which did he care most for, —doctrine, or life; belief, or practice; talk, or work; creed, or deed? That Jesus believed himself to be the "Messiah" I have no doubt. That he openly and repeatedly said he was, and called upon men to acknowledge him as such, appears to me not to lack the most ample evidence. Almost every great man is small enough to have some swelling and ill-suppressed egotism about him. It seems to be the strange fate of nearly all masterful men to be conceited, to redden all over at times with a perfect fever of self-exaggeration. Jesus was no exception to this general rule. He was a sublime egotist. No man ever claimed a greater place among men, or a more deferential regard from them, than he claimed. Pius IX., who claims spiritual supremacy over the whole world, is only an imitator of Jesus. It is hardly fair to berate the one and worship the other. "I am messiah and king," said Jesus; and he claimed to hold both offices by Divine appointment. And that claim he never withdrew after he once had made it, but persevered splendidly to insist upon it until the very end.

And yet, after all, it was not here that Jesus put his emphasis. Let us do him justice, for we can perfectly well afford to. Let us not make the mistake of taking Paul for Jesus, or Christianity for Jesus; but let us take Jesus for himself. Messiah he said he was, and king. But what for? His kingdom he sought not so much for himself as for others. He would rule, it is true; but he would rule for the good of his subjects. He would rule by greatness of benefaction; he would be master of all by being the most conspicuous and devoted servant of all. In his kingdom those should be greatest who were least in the eyes of the world. All the poor and the humble, all the oppressed and down-trodden, all the despised and forsaken, all the weak and the outcast,—these Jesus would befriend and enrich, and exalt and honor in his new and hoped-for realm. His egotism was not a mean one, nor his ambition a selfish one. He would bring all the world to his feet, but only to lift them straightway into his arms. If he was a king, he was a beggar-king; he would not keep anything for his own, but give everything away, and give himself into the bargain.

Jesus laid his emphasis on love, not on law. It was not power for itself that he wanted, but power for beneficence, power for blessing, power for uplifting. He had a perfect passion for loving all the lonely, the suffering, the helpless, the lost; and as perfect a passion he had for hating all the proud, the self-righteous, the hypocritical, the mean. He was a reformer more than a teacher; and a reformer, moreover, of the most so-called radical and fanatical sort. He had not much philosophy of reform, but great zeal in it. He was a peasant, one of the "common people," and he stood unflinchingly by his order. He blazed with wrath at the tyrannies and sins of the respectable, "gentlemen" class, but he was lenient and gentle towards the weaknesses and follies of those belonging to his own social rank. In theory and practice he was a thorough social revolutionist, and doubtless fairly earned the opprobrious epithets which the conservatives of his day flung so thickly at him. He deliberately violated and put his foot upon nearly every social custom and religious institution which they respected, and no more thought of taking a rich man or a pharisee into his fellowship than the pope thinks of blessing a heretic. He aimed at overturning not only the whole religious but social system existing at his time, sweeping it away with the besom of destruction, and substituting for it something in his eyes vastly freer, broader, nobler, fairer. The letter of dogma and observance and custom and law he would utterly abolish, and bring in the spirit of liberty and love and fraternity and peace. "I am come that ye might have life, and have it more abundantly," he exultingly declared. It was life,—deep, rich, full, free, glad and yet calm LIFE that Jesus put his emphasis upon, and nothing else so much. Beautiful enthusiast, splendid visionary, glorious dreamer that he was; my heart can forgive him every defect and every limitation, since so high above all else rose the exuberance and generosity of his human, loving life!

But, marvellous as it may seem, it is upon the least interesting, least permanent, least true in Christ that so-called Christians have builded. They have taken the very worst part of their master, and founded their Christianity on it. They have missed his grandest emphasis almost entirely. They have builded on his egotism, not on his enthusiasm. What he really cared least for they have made most prominent, and what he cared most for they have well-nigh neglected altogether. They have lifted the proclamation of his messianism on to their banner, and carried it into all lands; but they have neither founded their Church nor their State on his moral or social theories and example. For the most part they have left undone the very things which he commanded and did, and have observed and done those things which he repudiated and abhorred.

The result of all this is that there is the slightest possible ethical or social affinity between modern Christianity and the real man Jesus. If he were to come in our midst to-day, he would spew the Christian Church and Christian society out of his mouth; he would trample them under his feet with scorn. He would recognize in so-called Christians the facsimiles of those pharisees who formerly so inflamed his wrath and detestation. Think of the simple peasant-reformer of Judea walking some Sunday into one of our modern, richly-upholstered, carved, frescoed, stained, and dimly-lighted Christian churches in Boston; think of his looking about and beholding all the magnificence there,—the costly sacramental paraphernalia, the many-thousand-dollared organ and choir, the fashionably-dressed ladies and gentlemen! Let him hear that all this was observed, done, acted, and said in his name! Would he not flame with indignation and derision; would not all the old scornful epithets and denunciatory phrases which he flung at such things and persons in his day leap again from his lips; and would he not straightway turn his back on such a gilded mockery of his hopes and aims, and very likely find his way down to Parker Memorial Building, or up to Hospitaller Hall, or into some Labor Reform or Workingmen's Sunday Convention?

The fact is that Christians have lost their Christ, and Christ has lost his Christians. Among all those who call themselves by his name he would find the merest handful of true followers. Christians now are rich, and lovers of wealth, luxury, and sumptuary magnificence; Christ was poor, and expressly discouraged the laying up of riches, the wearing of extravagant apparel, and the living with thought or care for worldly things. Christians now are aristocratic, fashionable, and proud; they make laws which tell unequally upon those who have money and influence and those who have not. Christ was a communist; he went in for levelling all class-distinctions, and making all men equal and fraternal. Christians now are strict conformers to custom and institution; their worship is full of observances and forms and ceremonies; they make many and long prayers, and delight in every way to put their religion on parade. Christ was a non-conformist; he laid no stress on external observance; he loved simplicity and freedom in everything. How strange it is that Christians can think they are followers of Christ, when they are so unlike him in almost everything his heart was set upon! How passing strange it seems that they should have chosen him to be their leader, when we consider what he was! He was a radical of the most ultra stripe,—radical even to the extent of fanaticism. The fashionable religion, ethics, and society of his day he was opposed to utterly. The Christians in choosing him "caught a Tartar;" they chose one whom they could not and would not follow,—one whose non-conformism, communism, and religious and social radicalism have proven altogether too much for them.

If Jesus belongs to anybody, he belongs to the deepest-dyed radicals of this and every age! They understand and appreciate him better than Christians do or can. But they can accept him only as a fellow and a brother, not at all as a messiah or savior or leader. They cannot call themselves by his or any man's name. They are not Christians, albeit they revere and honor the man Jesus.

And therefore we may well ask, Are there any Christians? Those who call themselves Christians are not Christ-like; and those who are most Christ-like refuse to be called Christians. The time is evidently coming when we can say good-by both to the idea of "Christ" and to the name "Christian."

REV. N. G. MERRY, pastor of the First Colored Baptist Church, Nashville, Tenn., publishes a letter about the failure of the Freedman's Bank of that place, wherein he says:—

In 1871, Rev. J. W. Alvord, president of the bank, got me to call a meeting in my church, that he might speak to my people. I introduced Mr. Alvord, who commenced by saying:—

"I sometimes preach, but now I will talk to you about banks. You ask me, Is the bank safe? I'll ask you, Is Uncle Sam safe? (Many voices—'Yes, he is safe.' Another voice—'Can the bank break?') I'll answer you by asking, Can you break Uncle Sam? (Cries of 'No! no!') Then you can never break this bank. You can break Uncle Sam just as soon as you can break this bank. Every dollar of this bank is invested in United States bonds. I took a look over her bonds just before I left Washington." Mr. Alvord is a preacher, and I am one also. I want the world and all mankind to know that I have now found out that Rev. J. W. Alvord stood up in my pulpit and told a lie, thereby fooling many, and increasing the confidence of all present in the bank. Unless he repents of this sin (which is a great sin), hell will be his home.—N. O. Times.

A FOREGONE CONCLUSION. By W. D. Howells. Boston: Osgood & Co.

The appearance of a new book by Mr. Howells must always be a fact of interest to those who have at heart the welfare of our literature. It is, however, his fortune or misfortune to have met with very little serious criticism, and to have each new book accepted, as is each new poem by Longfellow, with a chorus of warm praise, through the author's name alone. There is in the American mind a quality of ready acceptance, after an author's prestige is fairly established. Mr. Longfellow has really had no means of knowing, these dozen years past, whether one of his new poems was good or bad; and Mr. Howells has almost as little. This makes it more needful to say, frankly and courteously, what one thinks of a new book from his delicate and facile pen.

A Foregone Conclusion deals with deeper motives and profounder character than its author has before attempted. This gradual deepening of the waters is encouraging. The priest in this novel is really an addition to literature, and it is something to say that the other characters, or at least the two women, are not sacrificed to him in delineation, but are also well sustained. Unhappily, the successful lover is even less interesting or commanding than such personages are wont to be; and we are left to wonder, as in A Princess of Thule, why so poor a creature should win so superior a woman. It may be said that it is often so in life, but so are many other things that are quite unavailable in literature. This essential defect in the motive supplied for the heroine's action must always remain a drawback on the execution of the book.

More commonplace than even the character of Ferris is the device, so familiar in fiction, by which he is estranged from his beloved; he sees her parting from his unsuccessful rival, and mistakes a gesture of pity for one of love. In general, the close of the book seems hurried and inartistic; and the slight prolongation of the story into the post-matrimonial jarrings seems a little cynical. In Vanity Fair it was necessary for Thackeray to hint that Dobbin was a little disappointed in Amelia, because the good soul had so palpably overrated her beforehand; but here, where the hero was only far inferior to his mistress before marriage, it is a pity to draw her down to his rather uninteresting level afterwards. Even the close of a romance may fairly enough retain a tinge of the ideal aspect.

The thing most to be regretted in this book is, however, to be found in a different direction. While Mr. Howells has never before reached such a depth in thought and character, he has never before allowed himself such carelessness of execution. He has sentences such as this: "There was a gondolier and a sort of house servant in the employ of the landlord, of whom Mrs. Vervain ordered them," (p. 63)—the italics not being his, and the sentence at first leading us to suppose that there was but one servant, acting in two capacities. In the use of the relative pronoun, especially, he disregards all recognized rules of relative and antecedent, and gives in one case such a prolonged tangle of pronouns as this paragraph:—

"She ran to another window and admitted the visitor. It was Ferris; and she went to announce him to her master by the title he had given, while he amused his leisure in the darkness below by falling over the cistern-top with a loud clattering of his cane on the copper lid; after which he heard the voice of the priest begging him to remain at his convenience a moment till he could descend and show him the way up-stairs. His eyes were not yet used to the obscurity of the narrow entry in which he stood, when he felt a cold hand laid on his, and passively yielded himself to its guidance. He tried to excuse himself for intruding upon Don Ippolito so soon, but the priest in far suppler Italian overwhelmed him with lamentations that he should be so unworthy the honor done him, and ushered his guest into his apartment. He plainly took it for granted that Ferris had come to see his inventions, in compliance with the invitation he had given him the day before, and he made no affectation of delay, though after the excitement of the greetings was past, there was a quiet dejection in the promptness with which he rose and offered to lead his visitor to his laboratory." (Pp. 46–7.)

In this short paragraph the masculine relative pronoun does duty no less than twenty-nine times. This repetition alone would be an inelegance; but further examination shows that in eighteen of these cases the pronoun refers to one person, and in eleven cases to another, without the slightest attempt to disentangle the references, or to keep the relative within speaking distance of its antecedent. By great attention on the part of the reader, and by keeping carefully in mind the successive stops of the interview described, it is possible to reach the end without serious mistake. But the object of good writing is to save this waste of labor, by the mere exercise of care in the structure of the sentence, as Hawthorne or Holmes would have done. And the more graceful and attractive the writer, the more justly we may demand of him to keep clear of such slovenliness, just as a great orator is peculiarly bound not to make slips in pronunciation. If Mr. Howells has no aim but popularity, these things will not harm him; our public is very lenient in all details of literary work. But if, as has sometimes seemed, he aimed at a higher standard, he should remember that noblesse oblige, and should not disdain these smaller matters of literary conscience. It is because he is capable of so much that he needs to be frankly reminded of his omissions.

THE RATIONALE OF PRAYER.

To the Editor of The Index:—

There has been so much written of late on the subject of prayer that it would almost seem as if every possible view of it had been presented. I do not know that my thoughts and convictions in regard to it will be either new or interesting to your readers, but offer them as suggestions the value of which others must determine.

To those of us who appreciate the importance of the passively impressible and receptive as well as the positive and active side of our nature, the intuitive impulse which leads to prayer is an indication that it is in some way proper and desirable, and that what we are to do is, not to repress the impulse, but to understand, if possible, the truth to which it points.

If we are over-inclined to scepticism, we shall be likely to deny the existence of any power which the intellect, in attempting to analyze, finds inexplicable, unless its results are so uniform and so palpable as to force us to admit it. On the other hand, those whose intellects are less active than their feelings will go on trusting to their intuitive perceptions, and if they attempt to account for them at all do so on suppositions quite inadmissible to the rational and unbiased mind. Only they whose dual nature is well balanced will be likely to question without undue scepticism, and to accept without superstitious credulity, truths which, to be rightly appreciated must be both felt and understood.

To those who believe that the great Over-soul, whose will is life to all created things, works in the government of this world of matter, through means, and not by that direct interference with the natural course of events which is called special providence or miracle, it would seem that this acting through intermediate agencies must be universal, both in regard to things which appertain exclusively to earth-life and those which affect man as a spiritual being. If, by certain appointed means, the corn grows and is harvested,—if by means the hungry are fed, the ignorant instructed, and all the needful work of the world done,—why should we imagine that, if prayer be available, it is made so by an immediate and special action of the Infinite Spirit?

If it be true (and many who are not Spiritualists so believe) that we are surrounded always by spiritual beings of all conceivable grades of elevation and potency, some of whom are drawn to us by personal affection or by elective attraction (as real as any other in Nature), and all of whom may be, in turn, acted upon by those superior in wisdom and power to themselves—how easy it becomes to see that these living though invisible agents may be used as the natural means of answering such prayers as they have the power and the will to grant! If we ask a friend in the flesh for help in time of need, we are not surprised that he should give it; why, then, should it surprise us that these friends, unfettered by material bonds and possessed of higher potencies, should often act in compliance with our requests? But why is it necessary to ask for such aid? Why are not our desires as likely to be heeded when they do not take such definite shape and expression? That greatest and most lucid of seers, Jesus of Nazareth, said to his followers, "Ask, and it shall be given to you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." Well he knew that the asking (audible or inaudible) was not a mere form or the offering of superfluous information, but a means of bringing the spirit of the seeker into rapport with supermundane forces, and probably often as needful to the result as is the connecting of the wire of an electric battery in order that the fluid may pass along it.

Those who have seen much of spiritualistic phenomena know that certain conditions must be observed in order to attain desired results; so, in prayer, those who act upon us, or upon other persons or things through us, do so under certain conditions fixed by natural law.

This action may be either spiritual or physical in its effects, according to circumstances; but in no case is it miraculous, and therefore never independent of means, which, while sometimes they appear to us trifling in character, may be all-important. We are often incompetent judges of what is trivial and what is of moment, and those who experiment scientifically with natural forces soon discover that a very slight change of conditions causes a vast difference in results.

In this view of the matter, it follows that the granting of that kind of prayer which is a mere asking earnestly for something which we strongly desire must depend on many things; upon the condition, mental and moral, of the asker, upon the ability of those in rapport with him to do the thing asked, and upon their seeing it to be desirable that the request should be complied with. This same uncertainty attends everything that we do. If in illness we use the remedy appropriate in such cases, the hoped-for effect may not be produced; and if we plant a seed, we do not know that it will sprout and mature. Still, when we are told that, in order to obtain bread, we must sow the seed, we do not pronounce the promise false because the harvest sometimes fails us.

We can but make use of the appointed means to obtain any desired end, knowing that disappointment is always possible. It has been objected that, when we pray for a physical result, we ask for a miracle; but Spiritualists know better. I have asked for rain, and had it fall upon me in a closed room where no water was present; and if this can occur under certain conditions at one time, a similar power may produce like (and indefinitely varied) results under circumstances favorable to its action. It is true that such an occurrence as this alluded to could only take place through medium-power; but this power is existent in a greater or less degree in all of us, and by its recognition and exercise this latent potentiality is developed, and we may all become more receptive of influences from the invisible world, and better conductors of these influences to other persons and things. It may be said that, if this be true, mediums would oftener than others have their petitions granted by spirits; and I do not doubt that this is in some measure the case. Gifted in different degrees and in varying attributes we all are, and it is vain to cry out in our ignorance against the unequal distribution as unfair. But while the impressional and conducting power of one in whom the medium-element predominates may bring about the fulfilment of certain requests, there are higher potencies and more subtile influences which it is not so easy to gauge, and the action of which we can only estimate through experience, this experience being, in the nature of things, chiefly, if not exclusively, conclusive to ourselves alone.

I think no one can make a habit of praying, conscientiously and earnestly, without becoming assured that prayer is a real power in our lives, though, like all others of a similar nature, its action cannot be assured in that absolute and definite way in which we may calculate on the answer when the question is a mathematical problem.

Let me here say that I would distinguish between that prayer which is the petitioning for such aid as we might seek from earthly friends able to afford it, and that lifting of the whole soul in thanksgiving, adoration, and unspeakable yearning for spiritual elevation and enlightenment which we can never feel an impulse to offer to any created being. But this does not prove that in giving even spiritual help, strength, and light the agency of finite spirits is not employed, nor that, in many cases, we may not rightly request of invisible friends such assistance as we may deem them able to render.

The idea of a "prayer battery" has been much ridiculed; but I believe it to be by no means so irrational as to many it very naturally appears. Where several are gathered together and united in an earnest longing and asking for a certain result which they deem good, the outflowing and incoming influences may be thus rendered more potent; and this belief in spiritual agency, and in the means by which it may be rendered available and its active power increased, is neither superstitious nor without foundation in facts as observed and experienced by those who have faithfully investigated spiritualistic phenomena.

I cannot enter more fully into the subject, here and now, without trespassing unwarrantably on your valuable space, and therefore leave these hints to be pondered upon or dismissed as idle fantasies, according to the impression which they may make upon different minds.

INTEGRITY FIRST AND FOREMOST.

New York, Dec. 7, 1874.

Editor Index:

Dear Sir,—A friend has asked me a question or two; may I refer them to you? He is just entering middle age, has a family of five to support, works hard; has been in business for himself, but was not successful; compromised with his creditors, but feels the debts as due all the same; at present earns just enough comfortably to support his family.

His employers are all professed Christians; the majority of his fellow-clerks are of the same faith; but he is very liberal, and is known as such, though I am not sure his employers realize that each week he receives liberal publications, papers, through the mail.

He asks me whether his first duty is not to serve his employers faithfully, and, as they never question his faith, to avoid making an issue with them on matters of belief, so long as they do not "open" the question. I have answered him, "Yes."

And he asks again if he should not, in the next place, work earnestly to pay his old debts, and make the support of his family an assured fact, before he engages actively in the liberal cause. Again I answer, "Yes."

Your correspondent, Mr. Voysey, in The Index of Dec. 3, speaks of a clergyman who, being an anti-Christian, does not say so, fearing the loss of a salary that is his sole dependence for the support of self and family.

This class is large, constantly increasing. At present it must not be too active, must let The Index and similar papers and such men as its editors lead, while they are the reserve.

That the time will come when this class will speak, I am convinced; and then we shall know that necessity, not preference, kept them in the rear so long, and realize that their courage in keeping quiet was but a little less true than the courage of those radicals who now speak boldly their views.

Yours truly, "A."

[There is no necessity for a business man to make any issue on religious subjects with his employers, so long as they do not make an issue with him. Neither should he avoid it, if it is forced upon him, by the least insincerity. If sincerity brings losses, they should be borne. The case is somewhat different with a minister, who is understood to speak his convictions without reserve; he can scarcely avoid an issue, if his convictions clash with those of his congregation, except at the expense of his sincerity. In neither case ought dissimulation to be practised at all. Manhood is worth more than prosperity.

As to the other question, a man ought to seek to pay his debts as a most sacred obligation, and ought not to disregard them for the sake of taking up any "cause" whatever. Our correspondent's friend should pay the last cent he owes, and provide properly for his family, before he "engages actively in the liberal cause." On that point we have no doubt. General philanthropy is never an excuse for neglect of private obligations. We believe in that "unpoetical" and perhaps stern morality which forbids a man, by defrauding his individual creditors, to lay upon them involuntarily the entire tax of public movements, however excellent these may be in themselves; and which forbids him to plunge his own family, against their will, into hardships which it is his duty to avert. If they consent freely to endure such hardships, the case is changed. Yet sincerity may entail hardships on him and them alike; and he is not bound to avert even hardships from his family by the sacrifice of that. It is a strong conviction of ours, strengthened by all our observations of human conduct, that character is seldom so severely tested as by money relations and transactions; and no virtue is worthy of higher reverence than inflexible integrity in the prosaic, common duties of life. The man who makes his own pledge a divine law to himself is the true hero; and we would not give a fig for the "heroism" which disregards it.—Ed.]

A NEW RADICAL SOCIETY.

Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 14 Dec., 1874.

Friend Abbot:—

On the first Sunday in September there was a free society organized at Clinton Hollow, Dutchess County, N. Y., under the name of "The Free and Independent Religious Society of Clinton Hollow." President, T. A. Cookinghane; Secretary, LeGrand Graham. This organization was a felt need in the place, as free thought had closed the church-pew to many; and some place for meeting seemed important. Meetings have been held as often as twice a month, and part of the time once a week, the results being very gratifying to the members of the meeting, and horrifying to the established church.

Poughkeepsie will feel the effects of this meeting, for it is closely related with the Hollow. Criticism and anathema are freely given by the Orthodox war-party; but the venom of their attack only festers in their own body. Other societies will soon be formed about here, and the essential value of character will be preached, where "Urim and Thummim" have hitherto been the centre of attraction. A dozen or more copies of Draper's Conflict of Science and Religion will become a circulating library of the society, and each copy be backed by honest, candid, neighborly good-will, and consistent manhood and womanhood. In these days we have much to cheer us, and a knowledge of the strength and power of ultramontanism will give strength, and intensify the efforts of the free minds of the age. There may be an element of cheer in the publishing of this organization by you. Respectfully yours, L. F. Gardner.

RELIGIOUS ADVERTISING.

New York, Nov. 17, 1874.

Dear Mr. Abbot:—

I am constantly receiving circulars from newspapers soliciting advertising. The "religious" papers do more or less of it. Here is a specimen of the way in which they appeal to business men:—

"It is an acknowledged fact that religious papers offer superior advantages to advertisers over any other class of publications. Not only their circulation but their character and influence give them the first position as advertising mediums. They circulate among the intelligent, enterprising, and reliable, and, therefore, the most desirable class to be reached by advertising. The religious paper is frequently the only one taken in a family, is carefully read by all, and is usually preserved, when the secular paper is destroyed, showing that it is highly valued: which facts should not be overlooked by advertisers. We would be pleased to have your advertising patronage."

Now is it true in a general way that religious papers go to the best class, and are the best advertising mediums? I answer, No. My experience shows me that the poorest mediums are the religious papers. Though I have nothing to advertise but what is wanted by humanity without regard to religion, and what is in demand by all classes more or less, yet I am sorry to say that my poorest returns have always been from advertisements in religious papers, and some of my best from irreligious ones.

Very truly, M. L. H.

Religion in its various dresses is responsible for many curious performances. The other day we observed the arrest of a fellow in Connecticut, who pounded his step-daughter half to death because she wouldn't go to the Catholic Church; and now we are told that H. Brewer, of Webster County, Kentucky, was fined $25 for pounding the Rev. Mr. Bone because he converted Mrs. Brewer to the Christian religion. If Mr. Brewer wanted a bone to pick with his wife, he might have found it outside of church matters; but, after all, it is much to the credit of this pugilistic heathen that he didn't exercise his pounding propensities on the helpless convert, his wife.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions,			10c per line.
" 13 " 25	"		8	"	"
" 26 " 51	"		6	"	"
" 52	"		5	"	"

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX.

Bound volumes of THE INDEX for 1871, 1872, and 1873, will be sent by express (at the purchaser's expense) on receipt of $2.50, $2.50, and $3.00 respectively. These volumes are exceedingly valuable singly, irrespective of each other; for the important essays and other articles they contain are of permanent interest, and will furnish as instructive reading twenty years hence as to-day. No more valuable present could be made to a friend struggling out of Orthodoxy than one of these volumes.

REASONS FOR USING THE

EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

No. 1 Tremont Place, Boston.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR:

ABRAM WALTER STEVENS.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
T. W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.

CHARLES VOYSEY, England.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

THEREFORE, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ——.

ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ——:

Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.

ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.

ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.

ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.

ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State; and no person shall ever in any State be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges, or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion.

SECTION 3.—Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of the second section of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

INDIANA should not rest till she redeems herself from the shame of excluding colored children from her schools.

ORTHODOX CONGREGATIONALISM is courting Orthodox Unitarianism (and vice versa), and there are whispers of a speedy marriage in "high life."

DR. DRAPER may find another fact to strengthen his argument that Catholicism is hostile to science, in the recent refusal of Archbishop Manning to permit a young convert to finish his university course at Oxford.

AT A MEETING of the Berlin (Wisconsin) Liberal League, held December 6, the following officers were elected: J. D. Walter, President; G. N. Smith, Vice-President; E. Smith, Treasurer; J. D. Kruschke, Secretary.

BISMARCK seems stronger than ever. But he is a mortal man, while the Church of Rome lives generation after generation. Will Germany find statesmen bold and farsighted enough to complete the work he must before long leave unfinished?

THE Nation thinks that "the indications are strong that the inflationists will be numerically stronger in the next Congress;" but that no measure either of inflation or contraction can be carried out. For one, we believe in a currency convertible into gold, and look on inflation in any form as at once wrong and foolish.

THE New Bedford Society is triumphant. It has scared off the interrogators, and the "confirmation service" has been indefinitely postponed! It is understood that a Soldiers' Monument is to be erected on the field of battle, with a marble statue of Victory on the top, and a Year Book on her spear-point flopping in the breeze.

HON. GERRIT SMITH, one of the purest philanthropists and noblest men this country has ever produced, and a generous friend to THE INDEX, died at New York on December 28, at the age of seventy-seven years. His benignant character has made him beloved by thousands, and many a heart will be heavy at the news of his death.

KATIE KING has been "scientifically investigated;" and two of the great lights of Modern Spiritualism, Hon. Robert Dale Owen and Dr. Henry T. Child, have very gently pronounced her a humbug. This speaks well for their honesty; but, considering their previous indorsement of her, their authority as experts in this line is seriously lessened.

THE Year Book is out; Mr. Potter's society is in; no questions have been asked! The consequence is that no confidence can be placed in those "lists;" for the compilers have not dared to ask whether they were "accurate" or not, and have turned out a piece of magnificent guesswork. What is the intrinsic value of its "lists" appears sufficiently from the fact that the "list" of life-members of the American Unitarian Association contains the names of Rev. G. H. Hepworth (Orthodox Nondescript), Bishop F. D. Huntington (Episcopalian), and other well-known non-Unitarians! Under such circumstances, who can "tell which from t'other"?

THE first number of the New England Journal of Education will be published at Boston, January 2, 1875, under the auspices of the American Institute of Instruction, and the Teachers' Associations of the several New England States. Hon. T. W. Bicknell resigns his position as Commissioner of Public Schools of Rhode Island, to assume its editorial management, and Chas. C. Chatfield, of New Haven, Conn., removes to Boston to take charge of the publishing. The Journal of Education will be issued weekly, each number containing twenty pages, of the size of the Christian Union, at the subscription price of $3.00 per year, including postage.

CARDINAL CULLEN, in his pastoral denunciation of Professor Tyndall's Belfast address, thus whittles the Pope's infallibility to an exceedingly fine point: "If a good Catholic," he says, "hears a contradiction between science and religion, it will soon be found only an appearance of contradiction; or if a contradiction really exists, it will be found that the boasted discovery which creates it is but an ephemeral theory, and not the truth; or if its truth be beyond gainsay, and the contradiction plain, then the doctrine with which it is in conflict will be found to be but a theological opinion and not a dogma; or if it be a dogma, it has been misunderstood, or not explained according to the mind of the Church."

A CURIOUS contemporary thinks that Father Watmough, of Warrington, England, was "disingenuous," when he said recently: "The noblest gift any man had was his intellect, and, when God would have man show to him supreme worship, he demanded the sacrifice of that gift—man's reason. 'Very hard lines,' says the devil; 'my reason is my pride, my treasure, everything to me; and I cannot, I will not, offer it to God.' That was the temptation which came into the minds of all men, but God said: 'I will have the sacrifice of that reason of yours.'" To our thinking, the Catholic priest was exceedingly ingenuous; and the only "disingenuousness" is to be found in those Christians who claim that Christianity does not demand the sacrifice of reason.

MR. GLADSTONE has recently written as follows to the Rev. Vance Smith: "A firm adherent of the principle of dogma and under strong convictions as to the central elements of the dogmatic system of Christianity, I joyfully admit that the moral and spiritual results of that religion in very many cases overflow its dogmatic borders, such as I seem to see them. I have had many friendships with Unitarians, and have derived much benefit from them; and I am truly glad to think that the Almighty is not stinted or limited in his modes of operation, and that those who in fact bear the blessed likeness of Christ are most truly and surely his." Some men have the faculty of sitting gracefully on the fence, and Mr. Gladstone is one of them. We admire his spirit, and commiserate his logic.

AMONG some old newspaper clippings we find the following, without any indication of its authorship: "I beg leave to propose a short, clear, and strong argument to prove the Divine inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. The Bible must be the invention of either good men or angels, bad men or devils, or of God. It cannot be the invention of good men or angels, for they neither would or could make a book and be guilty of representing themselves as God, saying, 'Thus saith the Lord,' when it was their own invention. It could not be the invention of bad men or devils, for they would not make a book which commands all duty, forbids all sin, and condemns their souls to eternal punishment. I therefore draw this conclusion that the Bible must have been given by Divine inspiration." If the Bible is an "invention" at all, we are constrained to declare that all the parties named had a hand in it; for no one of them could possibly have "invented" the whole. But one might as well talk of "inventing" the Astor Library. The Bible is a small library bound up in one volume—which does not make it one book. George Francis Train was imprisoned for circulating obscene literature, merely because he published certain indecent passages of the Bible all together, unaccompanied by the context. Was that portion of the Bible "given by Divine inspiration"? If so, what sort of a "Christian country" is this, to imprison a man who does but circulate the utterances of its own God? On the whole, the author of the above had better try again.

Charity and the Poor.

A SERMON PREACHED IN LYRIC HALL, NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 29, 1874.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

The subject of this discourse is Charity and the Poor. It is a subject of universal and permanent interest: of pressing interest on the edge of a winter that may be severe, and is certain to be commercially dull, and therefore hard to the unemployed and helpless; but of profound interest at every season. It is one of the subjects that concern society itself in its very constitution, and should be studied rationally, when feelings of compassion are not excited, as they are now. But the hour of discussion is appointed, not chosen. It is idle to speak when none will listen, and it is difficult to speak reasonably when the listeners are under the influence of emotion. Two kinds of appeal are addressed to the public. On one hand, we are urged, in the name of gospel charity, to give to the poor out of such plenty as we have, and meet their wants by ungrudging bestowals of money, clothing, food,—by opening soup-houses and dormitories, and by responding lavishly to the calls of the many charitable associations which take under their special charge certain classes of the destitute; on the other hand, we are warned, in the name of wisdom, against giving recklessly, and so creating more poverty than we relieve. On the one hand our feeling, on the other our good sense is plied with moving considerations, and between the two little to the purpose will be done. The problem of poverty is too serious to be thus loosely dealt with. The interests of society are too grave to be put at the mercy of a chance impulse or a half-enlightened policy. It is time that a matter of this magnitude should be dealt with on some fixed, intelligent principle.

Two methods of treating poverty practically are suggested—the method of the New Testament, and the method of social science: the former has been in operation for a great many hundred years, and is generally favored still in the high places of society; the latter is new, has but few intelligent advocates, is regarded with general disfavor, is spoken of harshly by those who do not understand it, and has not yet been adopted on any scale sufficiently broad to exhibit its peculiarity. But, as I am persuaded, it is from this latter method that light and help are to come.

The New Testament idea of poverty and its treatment is indicated in a few sentences which convey its whole scope, and in language that admits of no misunderstanding. Such passages as the following need no interpretation. In the beatitudes of Luke, by many believed to be the original ones, the kingdom of heaven is promised to the poor. "Blessed be ye poor; for yours is the kingdom of God." "Woe unto you that are rich; for ye have received your consolation." "Blessed are ye that hunger now; for ye shall be filled. Woe unto you that are full; for ye shall hunger." "Sell that ye have, and give alms," is a bidding given by Jesus to his disciples. To the rich young man who asked the way to the eternal life, the master says: "If thou wilt be perfect, sell that thou hast, and give to the poor; and thou shalt have treasure in heaven." And when the beautiful youth turns sadly away, unable to comply with so severe a condition, Jesus says: "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven." "Hath not God chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him?" writes James, the brother of Jesus, in the very spirit of the words just quoted. The parable of Dives and Lazarus conveys the same lesson that these passages inculcate. Dives is a rich man, who is clothed in purple and fine linen, and fares sumptuously every day; Lazarus is a poor man, who lies a beggar at his gate. The characters of the two are inferred from their condition. Dives is an outcast from heaven because he is rich, and when he dies goes directly to the place of torment. Lazarus is enrolled among the elect because he is poor, and, dying, is received at once in Abraham's bosom. One in his lifetime has his good things, dresses richly and dines plentifully, has servants and establishment; the other has his good things in the lifetime that follows. This is the gospel teaching on the subject of poverty, the only definite gospel teaching there is: and it justifies us in saying that in the New Testament poverty is regarded as a privileged estate; the poor are accounted a favored class; the duty of the rich, as defined, is to give a tenth part of their wealth to the poor, at any rate, as ordinary benefaction, while they that aim at higher attainment will give it all away and become poor themselves. The permanency of poverty, as a providential institution, is assumed by Jesus and the Evangelists without argument: "The poor ye have always with you." There is nowhere in the New Testament an intimation, prophecy, or glimmer of hope that poverty may, at some future day, pass away, or even that it may be in any degree alleviated while the world lasts. No suggestion is made looking towards its prevention or its diminution by scientific treatment. No hint is given of its depressing, demoralizing, dehumanizing influence. That it is incompatible with a well-organized society would never be guessed by a diligent reader of the gospels. But one method of dealing with it is proposed—the method of almsgiving; and this method, instead of being accepted as the best possible under the circumstances, is soberly and earnestly commended as being even more beneficial to the rich than to the poor; for while it alleviates merely the physical sufferings of the poor, it procures for the rich places in the heavenly kingdom, and thus becomes directly a means of salvation to them.

This view of poverty, and of the mode of relieving it, was bequeathed by the early Church to the later. It was the view practically adopted by Western Christendom. It was the view on which the charities of Christendom were organized. From it sprung the asylums, retreats, refuges, religious houses for men and women, monasteries, nunneries, the innumerable endowments for the care of humanity in every stage and kind of infirmity. When this system was at its height of popularity, it was customary for those who aspired to spiritual perfection to renounce their wealth, assume the garb and condition of mendicancy, and go begging from town to town. Distinguished men took on themselves the vow of poverty, making it a religious duty to call nothing their own, to engage in no industry by which property might be acquired, and to consume no more than their actual necessities demanded. In fact, for a time, the order of society was, as far as could be, reversed. The rich were taught to live for the benefit of the poor. The poor were the kings, patrons, and benefactors, the beloved of God, as the phrase "Christ's poor" expresses. The fruits of this system are still manifest all over Europe, but especially in Italy, the country where it held the longest and the most complete sway. That terrible fact, pauperism,—poverty accepted, chronic, established, instituted, the danger of society, the despair of philanthropy,—is the legitimate fruit of it.

Emerging from the Middle Ages encumbered with the ruins of the feudal system, the modern era of industry found itself hampered with this portentous relic; a thing foreign to its own genius, obstructing to its own activity, and out of the reach of its arm. To say that pauperism is incidental to an industrial age is, to speak mildly, a great mistake. The industrial ages have been steadily trying to get the mastery of it, so as to abolish it. It was the product of a state of society to which the new age was at every point opposed, but out of which the new age was slowly and painfully developed. The modern world found pauperism ready-made to its hand, and had to face it as it could. To meet such a phenomenon effectively was impossible: there were no implements; there was no knowledge; there was no grasp of the problem. The system that created pauperism created likewise the arguments that supported and the feelings that justified it, and discouraged all others. The new age could therefore only grapple in the dark with its ugly foe. The thousands of helpless poor who had been fed, housed, nursed, kept in a condition of deplorable preservation till they were literally deprived of all self-asserting ability, were flung in a mass upon communities that were struggling into new life; and to keep the swarming nest of monsters at a distance was all that could be thought of. Even yet the combat is not ended, though victory may be anticipated as the result of a social system that aims at giving everybody employment, and thus at making everybody self-maintaining and comfortable.

The successive poor-laws of England were framed less as deliberately-conceived measures for taking care of the poor than as defensive measures against the intolerable evils of pauperism engendered by the old Christian régime. In the early periods of the Reformation, laws of the severest kind were enacted to suppress the appalling mischief. Intense indignation was excited against able-bodied people who preferred beggary to work. As far back as the fourteenth century, five hundred years ago, statutes were passed decreeing that if such persons were detected applying for relief when work was to be had, they were for the first offence to be whipped, for the second to have their ears cropped, and for the third to be hung as enemies of the commonwealth. This, it will be observed, was before the much-abused industrial age had attained maturity or brought forth characteristic fruits. Every reign, from that of Richard II. to that of Victoria, was marked by fresh efforts to get control of this gigantic nuisance. They were but partially successful: wholly successful they could not be, because the new industrial age did not fully comprehend itself. It was still hampered by the old theories, still haunted by the old traditions, still possessed by the old fancies. It was not prepared utterly to discard what it had received as a legacy. It felt that pauperism was its enemy, but was not prepared to strike a blow directly at its heart. It knew it was a viper, yet held it to its bosom.

I affirm my belief, without the least qualification, that whatever improvement has been made in the condition of the poor has been achieved, not in spite of material industries, but by virtue of them, as a direct consequence of the agencies they set in motion. The condition of the poor, even in the most favored countries of the modern world, is bad enough, but it is vastly better than it used to be; and that it is better must be attributed to commerce, agriculture, manufactures, and the numerous practical sciences and arts that these have set in operation. When we call tenement-houses the disgrace of modern civilization, we must bear in mind the noisome holes in which poverty, in other days, made itself the companion of reptiles and swine; and when we cry out against under-ground cellars as places unfit for the lodging of human beings, we must not forget the dens which did not constitute even the meanest part of any architectural structure, where, in the "ages of faith," the candidates of the kingdom rotted in filth. These tenements and cellars are not the answer that civilization gives to the question poverty raises; they are simply the best answer it can give under circumstances not of its own creating. For the worst features of that miserable condition, other ages and systems and theories are responsible. For whatever is good and hopeful in it, the new ages of industry deserve all the credit.

One thing may safely be said: that the method of the Middle Ages, of the Christian Church, of the New Testament, has increased and established poverty, and made it, as it were, an institution on the earth. All do not regard this as a ground of reproach against the system: the good Romanist does not; the consistent Evangelical Protestant, if such a person exists, does not; for in the regards of both Romanist and Protestant the state of men in this life is of small moment as compared to their future destiny. The Romanist, with unquestioning confidence, accepts the practice of his Church; the Protestant quotes the New Testament, and takes the consequences; but every rational thinker, every student of social conditions, every friend of social progress for its own sake, does, and sees no safety for the future save in a frank and utter repudiation of the system that has wrought such disastrous effects on humanity.

It is the sober conviction of wise minds and kind hearts now that the system above described should be practically abandoned at the earliest moment, and that the new system should be adopted in its stead. Let almsgiving, they say, be stopped short; let poverty be discouraged and shamed. Let it be assumed as a first principle that pauperism has no rightful place in modern society; that poverty is an evil, and a removable one; that the poor are to be stimulated, not drugged; to be made independent of aid; to be put on their mettle, and rescued from the imbecility into which compassion and almsgiving have sunk them. Almsgiving—the bestowal of money, food, clothing—out of an undiscriminating compassion, with no equivalent rendered, and no inability to work evident, is pronounced a crime as well as a blunder, an offence against the community and the mendicant as well. In the reign of Henry VIII., of England, a law was passed that whoever dispensed charity privately, and not through authorized associations, rendered himself liable to a penalty equal to ten times the amount given away. There are some among ourselves who would not be sorry to see such a law re-enacted, so deep is their conviction that the method of almsgiving is fatal to any substantial improvement in the condition of the poor.

If the poor must be aided—as they must be at present, and will need to be for generations yet, for the permanent causes of poverty will not disappear in many days, and incidental causes will recur so long as the industrial world is exposed to disturbance from panics and failures,—the aid should be dispensed by responsible people, acting in concert, in well-considered and thoroughly-organized fashion. Charitable societies exist in sufficient number and variety of purpose to meet every exigency. No class of people, no species of want, is unprovided for. In fact, wants are invented in order that they may be provided for. At the Thanksgiving season, when the charitable associations present their claims, one is surprised at the amount of effort that is expended in relieving human want. It is no difficult task to satisfy oneself in regard to the respective merits of these societies, and decide which of them answers to the particular phase of necessity in which he is interested. By doing that, and then by making such society as one has confidence in the depository of all the charity he has to bestow, his duty will be fully discharged, the chances of imposition will be reduced to the smallest point, the best economy will be secured, and real needs will be served in serviceable fashion. It is my firm belief that if charitable persons would make it an inflexible rule never to give alms, but to entrust their benefaction, of whatever kind it may be, to some well-conducted society, whose operations are open to inspection, and whose servants are worthy of confidence, the benefit to the poor, as well as to the community at large, would be incalculable. If no single society covers every demand, then contribute to two, or three, or even more—to as many as will, collectively, meet the requirement; but let the supplies be given to these; make them the almoners, under the public eye; work with their machinery, and in no other way, unless under circumstances that render your personal interference entirely safe.

Let no effort be spared to make organized associations wise, honest, and efficient. Let the best, and only the best, be countenanced. Withhold support entirely from such as pursue a false plan, or nurse an artificial need, or cherish sectarian or party purposes, or refuse to let in the full light of day on their proceedings, or cannot justify themselves by good judgment and wise economy. The attempt made last winter to institute a Bureau of Charities, a charity clearing-house, for the simplifying and consolidation of beneficent work, revealed many things, and among other things this: that all societies, instituted ostensibly for the benefit of the poor, are not charitable societies; that some at least are sectarian societies bearing charitable names. The plan projected fell through because associations of this kind refused to allow their operations to be overlooked. The work of helping the poor is too serious to be done in the dark, no matter what church professes to do it; and no wise man will give the smallest aid or countenance to such. There are responsible bodies enough without wasting sympathy and resources on such as confess themselves not responsible to public sentiment. Could all such be abolished, and the work of ministering to the imperative wants of the poor be committed to one or two that can prove themselves to be worthy of support, the problem would be reduced to very manageable proportions. A single association, like that for "Improving the Condition of the Poor," ably officered, and heartily supplied with means, would be adequate to the care of the permanent or resident poverty of a great city, during an exceptionally hard winter, when the honest and industrious, who are needed there, must be sustained till better times return. Another, equally well-appointed, might suffice for the vagrant poor, who will diminish in number when indiscriminate bounty is stopped. At present the work is in too many hands; it is unnecessarily subdivided; four or five times the amount of money is expended that the need requires, and a most preposterous proportion goes for office-hire and wages. The consequence is, a wicked waste of energy and resources, confusion in the public mind, division of counsel, imposition on the part of designing knaves, and a feeling of disgust in the minds of sensible people.

The method of almsgiving has been demonstrated to be mischievous and false. Its weakness is openly and loudly confessed. But it is an inveterate custom, sanctioned by the pious belief of many generations, and such customs are not easily discontinued. Nothing less than a determined effort made from a principle will loosen their hold on the unreflecting mind. It is so much easier to continue an old practice than to discontinue it, that mere habit will override anything less stubborn than conviction. People practise almsgiving who know it to be wrong; people defend it who know it to be irrational. Sentimental considerations are brought in to justify what good sense and experience condemn. A glance at two or three of these excuses, for they cannot be called arguments, will sufficiently show the flimsiness of their substance.

Almsgiving, it is said, is made imperative by an unconquerable instinct, that commands us to pity and aid the suffering, and that instinct being part of human nature satisfies us in regard to the wisdom of its suggestions. It would be nearer the truth to say that almsgiving is dictated by an unreasoning impulse, born of tradition and usage, which is mistaken for an instinct solely because it is thoughtless. It is not nature but a habit that has become a second nature, against which nature needs all the more to reassert itself.

It is said, again, that almsgiving is necessary to bridge over the interval between the old system and the new, and make some sort of provision for the poor until a better method can be devised. But if a new method be advisable, why not try to find one? Why not follow up the small beginnings that have been made? Almsgiving belongs to the old system wholly; it has no part or lot in the new. And to go on practising it is simply postponing the inauguration of a better mode.

It is urged, further, that almsgiving is useful in keeping alive the benevolent affections, which otherwise would die from lack of exercise. If there were no way but this of keeping alive the benevolent affections, a doubt might be entertained of the wisdom of discontinuing so old and popular a school, for the benevolent affections are a most important part of our nature. But when so many ways for doing good to the poor are open—the way of personal visitation, of private inspection and care, of organized social activity, of public effort after their physical and moral improvement, all so much more difficult and consequently so much more disciplinary than almsgiving, so much better calculated to mature and educate the benevolent affections,—this argument lacks force. If the truth were told, the motive to almsgiving with the great majority of people would be confessed to be a wish to be rid of the poor on the easiest terms. The quality encouraged is not so much charitable feeling as it is indolence, thoughtlessness, the disposition to satisfy conscience with a semblance of service, and to evade the sterner demands of duty. Almsgiving is the least expensive way of regarding the wants of poverty, and as being the least expensive is the most popular.

It is undoubtedly true that "some habitual association with the poor, the dependent, and the sorrowful is an indispensable source of the highest elements of character;" but such association most of us are, at one time or another, compelled to make, under circumstances that admit of no challenge. To make it, as a rule, with the poor of a great city is too difficult for general accomplishment. It would be well if, as a working clergyman suggests, individuals would devote a portion of every day to the personal visitation of the poor in their neighborhood; but if any one thing is certain, it is that individuals will do nothing of the kind. It is useless to urge it. Other duties and engagements, the love of ease, the desire for rest, the dread of exhaustive and unpleasant tasks, render this mode of relieving poverty the most visionary of all.

We must take people as they are, not as they ought to be; and until a moral conviction, far more deep and controlling than exists in the community at present, can be begotten, it will be idle to expect the consecration that personal intercourse with the poor requires.

Besides, if all this could be controverted, there are other matters to be considered than the cultivation in ourselves of certain delicate elements of character. The interests of society are to be considered; the manhood of the poor themselves is to be considered; the need of judgment and system is to be considered; the importance to ourselves of rational views, and firm determinations, and a habit of regarding all large subjects in their broadest aspect is to be considered. Charitable feelings are precious, are worthy of all respect, deserve careful fostering and conscientious nursing; but they must not be allowed to interfere with that larger development of mind on which the progress of mankind depends. God forbid there should be less love; God grant there may be more light. At present, the demand for light is the more urgent. Not to love less, but to love wisely, is the need of the hour. Not a smaller supply of steam, but a larger supply of well-constructed engines, is the thing to be desired.

Poverty is to be abolished by a change in the social conditions that produce it. But this change cannot be effected in a day—cannot be effected at all by artificial means. The ideal arrangement of society is not to be anticipated. The process of evolution is slow; each phase must be passed through and exhausted before the next is reached. Projects for compressing into ten years the growth of a century always fail. Plans for manufacturing an immediate Eden are advertised, but the Eden does not appear. It is of no use to cut a channel before the water has reached your farm. Wait till the current flows, then open a way for it.

Some years ago, a wealthy banker caused to be built, in different parts of London, rows of dwellings for the poor. His hope was, that people of the most moderate means, seeing their convenience, would desire to occupy them, would save out of their small earnings enough to pay the merely nominal rent, would acquire habits of cleanliness and decency by living in them, would take better care of themselves and their families, and by degrees rise out of the condition of poverty. The design was to improve the estate of the poor, by opening a new and attractive way out of it. The plan was carefully considered, matured with all possible judgment, and animated with all possible good-will. In a certain way it was successful, but not in the way anticipated. The persons for whom the buildings were intended would not take them. The currents of poverty set in other directions; and while respectable mechanics availed themselves of the opportunity to hire comfortable lodgings at small cost, no encouragement whatever was given to the belief that a model street or village would have the effect to make a model world. Money spent in anticipating wants is usually money wasted. The desirableness of having the wants felt is unquestionable; but if they are not felt, it is unwise to act as if they were.

Many years since, a rich capitalist, of Philadelphia, left an immense sum of money to build and endow an asylum where a great number of orphan boys could be sheltered, fed, clothed, taught, without expense. The author of this magnificent scheme for rescuing a regiment annually from destruction was a man of practical sagacity and benevolence; his early life had taught him lessons of poverty; in his later life it had been his wont to devote a considerable part of his time to relieving the necessities of his kind. He was deeply impressed by the misery of orphanage among the poor, and it seemed to him that by snatching a portion yearly from their wretchedness, and keeping them within the reach of humanizing influences, the morass of pauperism might be gradually drained dry. The plan was well digested, and munificently carried out. The accommodations are used; there is no lack of boys willing to be clothed, fed, taught, and made respectable by being apprenticed to good trades. Yet thoughtful persons pronounce the institution a failure in respect to the ultimate purpose it was designed to serve. It is alleged that the establishment is a sumptuous asylum; that the boys there are simply removed from the world they were born into, and deprived of the natural discipline and education of circumstances; that their mode of life, their instruction, their training, are artificial; that they grow up to the age of eighteen in seclusion, wholly without knowledge of the world, and then are sent out into life unprepared to face the duties of any condition. An eminent lawyer assured me that the institution was regarded, by many of the best people, as a nuisance; that as a solution of the problem of poverty, it was without value; and that it threw upon society, every year, a number of lads whom it was harder to provide for than it was for the poor themselves.

Millions of money are spent yearly in endeavors to adjust circumstances to the Indian tribes, so that they will be happy, peaceful, and civilized; agencies are established, officials are paid, supplies of food are accumulated, implements of agricu[lture] furnished: but the impression made on the [mass] light, and the advance made towards a solu[tion] the problem of their destiny is imperceptible. Gra[nting] ing that the utmost has been done that could have been done under the circumstances, that qualifying clause "under the circumstances" implying, as it does, that circumstances are adverse to the enterprise, that it is "against the grain," is a confession that a wrong method has been pursued. Things must be taken as they are, not as they are not; no ingenuity, no benevolence, no kindliness of intent, no device of philanthropy will discharge the function of those social laws which are commissioned to adjust the relations of mankind. The attempt to make men act beyond the measure of their attainment will ever end in failure. The philanthropist earnestly wishes it were otherwise, does what he can to make it otherwise; by hastening the progress of public opinion begets a desire that it may one of these days be otherwise; but he must use such tools as are fashioned to his hand, and must be patient if they break.

The fate of the poor is not thus in our hands; we are not in our own hands; all, rich and poor alike, are in the hands of that inscrutable Providence that works out its own plans, in its own way, and in its own time, and never delegates to mortals the power to drag its chariot beyond the allotted rate of speed. This Providence has allowed proverty ever since it has permitted man to dwell on the planet; has continued it in spite of all the endeavor of good men to abolish it; has made it a condition of social progress, a factor in human affairs that cannot be dispensed with. The misery of it is evident enough: that cannot be exaggerated; to think of it is heart-breaking. But it is not in human power to abolish it, or greatly to mitigate its sorrows. The utmost we can do is to study the apparent design of the working Providence, coöperate with that, throw the least amount of obstacle in its way, and trust that, in the fullness of time, the desired end will be achieved.

Let the doctrine of this discourse be understood. It is not a doctrine of fatalism or indifference; it is not cold, or heartless, or unbelieving. It casts no chill reflection on the sympathetic feelings of humanity, discourages no fine impulses, discountenances no generous experiment. It simply makes a distinction between impulse and method, between the propelling force and the machinery. Of love there is none too much; there cannot be too much. Compassion, pity, human sensibility, right, and gentlemindedness are not, and never have been, in excess of need. To increase them should be the diligent effort of all who would make the world richer and sweeter than it is. There is too much selfish love of money and ease, too much indifference to the welfare of others, too much thoughtlessness for others' misery, too much irrecognition of the claims of the community at large. The feebleness of the sympathetic instinct is one of the evidences of very partial advance in the social development of mankind. But were all the fine qualities augmented ten-fold, they would confer no ability to deal wisely with the problem before us. The question, How shall the poor be treated? is not a question for generosity to answer, or philanthropy, or the tender wisdom of the heart. It is a question on which, more than on any other, the light of experience and of knowledge is required.

There are some who say: Leave the problem of poverty to the solution of the social laws; leave the poor alone to the operation of natural conditions; give up devising plans for their relief, and learn to do nothing. They that speak in this way are humane men, who have ears quick as any to the cry of distress, and hearts sensitive as any to the appeal of misery. They see more suffering as the fruit of interference than as the fruit of apathy. The quickest way, in their judgment, out of the predicament, is the way appointed by Providence: the way, painful and slow, but sure, of social evolution. They are deep believers in God. If they forget anything, it is the fact that human progress is not left to natural laws, unless the natural laws are understood to include man; that social science deals with human beings, and supposes the action of human thought and feeling; that the divine power operates not in chemistry, or mechanics, or the law of demand and supply, as characteristically as it operates in the heart and will of intelligent creatures. Warmer, then, be that heart! more consecrated and persistent that will! But let both be subservient to the large reason which should preside over all.

THE SCHOOL QUESTION SOUTH.

Editor of The Index:—

Doubtless the telegrams from this city the past few days have shown the people North the disturbed condition of New Orleans regarding the question of mixed schools.

Nearly every test case that has come up under the constitutional amendments seems to have been destined to its first important issue South in this city, owing no doubt to the facts, first, that the further South the stronger the Southern feeling among the whites; and, secondly, that in this State the two races are about equal in number, thus making a contest more bitter.

This morning the New Orleans Republican, the official organ for this State and city, gives, as its leading editorial, an article on this subject which cannot fail to be of interest to The Index readers. For not only at the South has this become a question of the hour, but in portions of the East and West as well. Quite recently the courts of Indiana have passed upon the subject, and that, too, adversely to the colored children, who were excluded from the public schools in that State. There being no other provision made for such children, they are, by that court decision, without any school privileges to-day, and most likely will soon, as the New York Republic intimates, be arrested as vagrants. Then the august courts of Indiana will read to them another lecture, and send them to the penitentiary. A nice substitute for the schoolhouse which the honorable court (heaven save the mark!) forbade the colored child to enter.

But to the Republican's article to which I have alluded. Whether it strikes a false note or the keynote for future action, I leave the reader to judge. Equally sincere people will differ regarding race distinction; but at least we can all agree that to no child in the land should the school-door be closed.

W. F. PERKINS.

NEW ORLEANS, La., December 16, 1874.

POLITICAL EQUALITY AND SOCIAL INDEPENDENCE.

The bequest of Hon. Charles Sumner to the Republican party involves a responsibility, but implies a discretion. The theory of political equality implied the abolition of all legal obligations which give the one man power over the acts of another. Every Republican acknowledged the justice of this as an abstract principle, and when the results of the war broke the chains of the slave, all were alike determined they should never again be riveted upon him. To this extent the Republican party was a unit with the abolitionists. When, however, it is proposed to pass the limits of political equality, and compel one political equal to accept the companionship of another, then any act which enforces compulsory association becomes a violation of the principles of equality. For while one man is the equal of any other man who has to fight the battles or give the votes of society, there can be no reason why this equality should handcuff one man to another in other relations of society, which can in no manner affect the political equality of one man to another. It is this claim of a right by ecclesiastics to compel uniformity in religious opinion, and to compel all men to occupy sittings in the same church, which has occasioned so much strife. Each man has a right to worship after his own fashion, and in such society as he may prefer; nor has any government the right to compel one man to pay tithes to dispense a doctrine he does not believe, or to place his children where they may hear a faith which their father professed treated as a blasphemy.

Such is our distinction between the right of political equality and the equal right of social independence, Mr. Sumner lived to see the one enacted and enforced throughout the Union. His friends seem disposed to maintain the adoption and enforcement of the other.

Among the various causes assigned for the defeat of the Republican candidates at the fall elections is alleged to have been the text of the Civil Rights Bill, which enacts the compulsory intermixture of the two races in place of public assemblage. Whatever may have been the force of this bill, it seems to have been regarded by the Committee on the Judiciary in the House of Representatives as worthy legislative consideration. An amendment, by way of a substitute for the Civil Rights Bill, was offered by a member from Alabama. It was discussed informally, and upon a vote taken it appeared that the members from Alabama, Wisconsin, Indiana, New York, and Illinois voted for, and the members from Massachusetts, New York, Maine, and Pennsylvania voted against, it. Here was a majority of one vote for reporting the substitute, two members absent. The bill and substitute were referred to a sub-committee, who will frame a measure for the consideration of the House. Here, then, is an issue distinctly made upon the principal feature of the Civil Rights Bill.

* * * * * * * * *

This question of equal and separate social facilities presents, perhaps, more difficulties in Louisiana than elsewhere, and requires a proportionate prudence in its discussion and decision. We will, however, confine its consideration at present to the compulsory union of the two races in the schools. This has been a perpetual source of exasperation, and a prolific excuse for abuse, and has no doubt operated greatly to promote the opposition to the extended right of suffrage. Certain important political principles have been asserted in the constitutional amendments. Upon these the Republican party is a unit. There is an assertion of certain social rights. In regard to this last the Republican party is divided, while the opposition, which aims at the overthrow of both the admitted principle and the controverted right, is in solid and compact resistance.

Thoughtful men see in the liberation of the slave an extraordinary exercise of natural justice. They note in his elevation to the platform of equal political right a wise precaution for his education and self-protection as a citizen. But this earthquake is followed by its oscillations. In the attempt to carry this revolution beyond its primal force there is a risk of reaction. In the attempt to enforce the social equality of those who were so lately separated by a relation so repulsive, there may be danger that even previous concessions may be reconsidered, and that freemen may be even remitted and remanded to a state of prolonged probation.

We have another social peculiarity in Louisiana. Of nearly four hundred thousand blacks we have fifty thousand of mixed blood. Of these last there are many of education, refinement, and in every respect estimable as friends and citizens. Among themselves they enjoy all the institutions of religion, literature, and accomplishment. It may be said that they are as little separated from the whites in prejudice as in complexion, and that they no more consort in social intimacy with the most pronounced negroes than do the most fastidious whites. On the other hand, there have been unhappy historical examples of the hostility of the blacks to those of mixed blood. It is notorious that the demand for the indiscriminate association of races comes from this peculiar class. The great mass of the negroes are at least indifferent to this privilege. They are content with the great boon of freedom and political equality. We do not care to jeopardize these substantial blessings for the assertion of an association which would be as uncomfortable to them as to the whites. If in this case those who would exact social equality as a right stand to those who do not desire to do so, as one is to eight, is it prudent to risk the assured rights of the eight for the speculative privileges of the one? We should, at least, require some proof by popular vote that a majority of colored people demand mixed schools before we should feel justified, as their representative, in insisting upon such a condition of popular education.

It will have been observed that the Republican has been ever the advoeate of the industrial unification of the races. They may dwell in harmony, if mutually useful, but will be ever in a very unfortunate and unequal antagonism, if forced by law into relations which the one does insist on, and which the other will never grant.

Suppose, then, we halt, and justify the positions of freedom and suffrage, before advancing? To this point we are accompanied by the whole American people. Beyond, we may find our forces weakened by the withdrawal of friends who may be induced to accompany us no further.

Suppose we encourage the Southern people to give the colored man a home, and to value him as a permanent producer. Let us impress the value of a race which fears no vicissitude of our climate; which can perform all manual and menial labor; which can be trusted with the infant and with the household. Suppose we educate this race until they can conduct the mechanic arts and manufactures among us; who can navigate the ocean as mariners, and supply to the nation the element of acclimated sailors, always ready to brave the pestilential diseases on the tropical coasts.

Is it not better to cultivate the kindly relations of the races than to seek causes of hostility? The wounds of the Union, the pride of race, the loss of property, the sense of dependence are all fresh. Is it wise or fraternal to inflame that wound, to insult that pride, to rejoice over that loss, to increase that sense of dependence? We have no disposition to do so, and we know the negro, grateful for the blessings he enjoys, and desiring to live in amity and usefulness with those among whom he was born and reared, is not disposed to exasperate the antagonisms which have inflicted so much wrong and injustice upon him.

We should have, if called on to vote on the proposed amendments of the Civil Rights Bill, to bear in mind the principles enounced. We would endeavor to maintain the unity of the Republican party, upon which the preservation of the right of universal suffrage may perhaps depend, and would accept separate and equal facilities for the enjoyment of social custom and commerce. This we would do rather than by a forced and agressive demand place again in jeopardy all that has resulted from the great sectional strife which has made the Union one and perpetual, as it has repealed all inequality in the political rights of the whole people.

MODERN SCEPTICISM.

BY THE REV. JOSEPH A. OWEN.

Is modern scepticism absolutely new, as compared with the scepticism of preceding ages? To demonstrate the affirmative is to prove the need of a new method of redarguing scepticism.

We propose to attempt such demonstration. Amid the tons of discussion, pro and con, which the above question has developed, we can scarcely find one ounce of positive proof. There has been a ceaseless flow of words about the "root-bias of modern sceptics against the supernatural," their "utter negation" of the supernatural, their "pronounced repugnance" to the supernatural, etc., etc.

All this, however, is but the surface of modern scepticism. No one has yet laid his finger on the germ out of which this deadly root-bias has been developed, or the natural fact which has given birth to their negation, or the substance whose dark shadow has eclipsed their belief in the supernatural.

Had this been done, the absolute newness of modern scepticism would have been demonstrated; since the germ, or fact, or substance itself being unquestionably new, the root, negation, or shadow developed by it cannot be otherwise than modern. To the argument then.

Has modern science disclosed any fact that changes in any respect the ground on which we worship a personal God?

We propose to show that it has, and that this fact is the correlation and conservation of forces.

Will it be denied that this is both a "proved fact of science" and a fact also discovered and established by the science of the present day? Dr. McCosh, the ablest and most cautious advocate of the philosophy of Orthodoxy, himself admits that it "has been scientifically established by men like Mayer, Joule, and Henry," and characterizes it as the "grandest scientific truth established in our day."

This recently "proved fact of science," then, we affirm to be the physical germ or basis of modern scepticism. Observe, correlation is the physical basis simply. We thus guard our language because the physical basis of any system necessitates and is dependent for its meaning and stability on another and deeper—a metaphysical foundation.

That modern scepticism—as represented by such thinkers as Spencer, Tyndall, and Huxley—does, at least theoretically and professedly, rest on this "proved fact of science" as its physical basis is too notorious to be disputed. They are all believers in the established fact of the persistence (conservation) and equivalence of force, which fact is again and again declared by Spencer to be the basis of his whole system, and is characterized by Tyndall, in his late address, as "that doctrine which binds Nature fast in fate to an extent not hitherto recognized."

But, what is more conclusive on this point than the mere avowals of sceptics or logical inferences from their language simply, universal correlation, of which the above-mentioned sceptics are the leading exponents, by its very conception, utterly excludes supernaturalism from the universe, inasmuch as, in the opinion of these scientists, it shows us a universe sufficient unto itself—a cosmos whose phenomena, physical, vital, and mental, are but varied forms and operations of one all-pervading natural force.

However much this law may be gainsaid by non-scientific men, it cannot be denied that, from Mayer, its originator, and Joule, its leading experimental verifier, to Grove, Helmholtz, and Tyndall, the weight of all purely scientific authority is in its favor. If it be objected that "the authority of sceptics ought not to be allowed to decide the question," we answer that their scepticism is the product of this very fact and its logical implications, not the fact the product of their scepticism; and we ask, Who shall determine purely scientific facts if not scientists themselves? We are aware that Dr. McCosh, while admitting, as we have already said, the "correlation of physical forces," objects to universal correlation. But he does not even profess to be eminently a scientist, and he himself has said that "religious men qua religious men are not to be allowed to decide for us the truths of science."

Thus do we lay our finger on a proved fact of science that changes in any respect the ground on which we worship a personal God. We point to the scientifically established fact of the "correlation and equivalence of force,"—physical, vital, and mental.

Will it be denied that this "changes in any respect the ground on which we worship a personal God"? What is that ground, pray, but the belief in or knowledge of the existence of an extra-natural Being of infinite attributes? But universal correlation, as we have before said, by its very conception, absolutely precludes such knowledge and belief. "Why so?" it may be asked. Why not? we might retort. "Your theory involves the eternity of matter," it might be answered. Your theory involves the eternity of God, we might reply. The one inclusion, per se, is no less thinkable than the other; while the former is lifted above all rational comparison with the latter by this great and unquestionable advantage; viz., that we know matter as force directly and immediately; while as naturalists—i.e., apart from Revelation—we do not directly and immediately know God at all. To postulate the eternity of what we do know thus directly, instead of what we do not thus know at all, may seem an enormous and noisy assumption to the teleologically saturated mind; but to the mind of the thorough-going scientist it seems infinitely the less assumptive, and, therefore, infinitely the more scientific of the two.

There is this additional advantage on the side of the sceptic: his position is susceptible of proof, while that of his opponent is not. The former asserts his belief in "a universe sufficient for itself." How has he reached such a conclusion? Capriciously and of dishonest will? Not at all. Laborious and patient investigation has shown him that every phenomenon is the direct result and exact equivalent of a previous expenditure of natural force, which he can weigh and measure, and that all orders of phenomena are correlated within a circle of iron necessity. In all his investigations he discovers absolutely nothing but what can be represented in terms of natural force, and so nothing which impels him to vault the abyss between natural force and a Supernatural Being.

Does he not find intelligence? it may be asked. "Yes" and "No." If natural intelligence—i.e., Nature, or force, as intelligent—be meant, we answer "Yes;" if supernatural intelligence—i.e., intelligence known to be the intelligence of a Supernatural Being,—we answer "No."

True, to save himself from this conclusion, an opponent might drag in at this point the conventional distinction between force as itself intelligent and force as the mere "agent" or "vehicle" of intelligence. But it is high time such pseud-ideas were banished into the realm whence they originated—vacancy. There is no such distinction. It is a mere figment of the brain, with nothing answering to it in reality. If anybody think otherwise, let him attempt to prove that man ever knows intelligence except as force, or force except as intelligence, in the sense of force working toward certain ends.

This conception of Nature as intelligent force also gives the death-blow to the so-called argument from "design;" since, if we know only natural force as intelligent, we must know natural force as the only possible "designer"—unless, indeed, there be some other than the existing evidential method of establishing the supernatural.

It is manifest that modern scepticism has come into the possession of arguments entirely original, and that, resting on a recently and scientifically established fact, it is itself so "new" that its opponents have not even comprehended its fundamental proofs and conceptions, much less refuted them.—Independent.

A LADY HAD SEVERAL hundred dollars' worth of point lace clipped off her clothing by an adroit thief, while she was at church, singing, "Strip me of the robe of pride, clothe me in humility."

A RELIGIOUS AMENDMENT.

It is not necessary to deny the perfect sincerity of those engaged in the movement which has, within the past two days, found a voice again in the Tremont Temple Convention. That they are truly Christian men who are endeavoring to inject a religious meaning above the general one into the Federal Constitution, with the highest and holiest interests of society closely at heart, and profoundly concerned for the reputation of the republic before the world, is beyond all shadow of question from the consideration of their character, their pursuits, and the singleness of their patriotism. But this undisputed fact does not displace the other impressive one, that it is too often from the zeal of the purest intentions that the most stubborn mischiefs spring, and that the use of carnal weapons has made religion responsible for conflicts which have reddened the soil of older countries with human blood. Not one of the conscientious gentlemen who are so eagerly urging on the present movement, as the centennial crown of our republican freedom, dreams of the possibility of so dire a culmination for his individual effort; yet it is as certain of attainment in the eye of sagacious penetration as that the fierce flames of awakened religious passion are irrepressible by any merely human power. There is already visible a not very faint premonition of this inevitable outbreak as soon as religious discussion becomes involved in purely civil and temporal affairs, in the language of one of the clerical speakers before this very Convention, who evoked its prompt applause by declaring that whenever an individual advocated principles which, according to the interpretation of a body like their own, was calculated to disorganize society, he was not only not entitled to its protection, but it "should treat him as a criminal, a scourge, and a curse." Now it is far from difficult to believe that many men who advocate principles which by certain other men are sure to be thus interpreted are as strictly conscientious in holding and advocating them as those who assume to be their censors and judges. Who in such a case is to decide? Evidently, there is no tribunal powerful enough to rein in the stormy passions to which conscience lends its stern vigor and strength; and the fearful alternative is a religious war by which nothing was ever yet established but the ultimate wretchedness of the parties engaged in it.

Bigotry kindles more rapidly than almost any other fire in the human breast. The belief that even by cruelty it is possible to do God service invariably intensifies the cruel desires. The first step taken by those who would subject free civil government to ecclesiastical doctrine is that of denying equal sincerity to their opponents, and of imputing to them in the broadest terms fraternization with infidelity. Such accusations are but fuel for kindling the flame which grows hotter with mutual crimination. In the fierce riot of passions thus aroused on behalf of the professed religion of love and charity, religion itself is speedily lost to view, and the struggle goes on for the establishment of a kingdom very different from the one which Christ assured his disciples was "not of this world." As the moral part of human character attests itself in its products rather than in its professions, so is the religious element of a nation to be sought in its life rather than in its specific acknowledgments. The way to lift the nation to a higher level of Christian attainment is by no formal remodelling of Constitutions, local or general. They would soon become as inoperative in that regard as are the resolutions of our quadrennial political conventions. If, as the managers of the present movement seem to apprehend, there is danger of the nation's lapsing into infidelity and atheism, let all history warn them that it is not to be rescued from such a fate by the method they have so unwisely chosen. It is vain to protest that this is no scheme for a conjunction of Church and State; enough that it is the entering wedge for the introduction of religious discussions into civil matters, and that their own Amendment will prove but irritatingly inefficacious unless it is supported by a sequel of statutes with their compulsions and penalties. Our early statesmen wisely avoided this rock. They saw in it the one peril which was to be avoided with the utmost care. What Jefferson, and Adams, and Franklin rejected, with prophetic sight as well as larger convictions, building as they did for religious as well as civil liberty, was opposed in a like spirit by our own Andrew and Sumner among modern statesmen. America was to be the land of promise for Jew and Gentile alike, whose self-government was to fit them, as an united people, for a better religion than any which ecclesiastical authority might seek to impose.—Boston Post.

THEOLOGICAL PENALTIES.

There is one class of ministers and priests with whom we have most hearty sympathy, and that is the class of young ministers who have not sufficient command of their powers to make a successful stand alone, and have not fame enough to make them valuable accessions to other bodies than those in which they find themselves, but who have outgrown their ecclesiastical relations and sympathies. They have been educated for a profession by methods which inevitably reduce their ability to enter into the bread-winning trades. They have probably married, and children are born before they have passed through the first superficial experiences under the impulse which sent them into the ministry; and now, when they come down to the facts of the situation, they are appalled by the prospect. They have vivid conceptions of the penalties which may be imposed in the rupture of social ties, the alienation of friends, the loss of support for the dependent family, and the mischief which may be wrought for them by misunderstanding or malice. It requires much boldness and fortitude to enable a modest and conscientious young man to cast himself upon the world with the conviction that it holds a safe place for him. His doubts and fears are likely to be exaggerated; but they are real. Especially is this true as one approaches the border-line between Christianity and non-Christianity. It is a strange mistake to suppose that it involves no penalty for a young man to say: "I cannot conscientiously call myself a Christian." Because it does put a very severe and, in some cases, the prospect of a crushing, penalty before the minds of such young men. We deprecate the strain which is being put upon the Christian name. Many a man is tempted to imagine himself insincere in taking it, because the stake is so great. A strong man of experience, one who is versed in literature, or who has in his capacities and culture many strings to his bow, may make choice with airy grace or with resolute decision, and with no thought of martyrdom. But if the next quarter's bills absolutely depend upon the making of the "Christian Confession," as in more than one case they do, it suggests a painful doubt to many who would not think of departing from their hearty allegiance to Christianity if left to their own impulses and convictions.

Certainly, if one has made up his mind that he is no Christian he is the more bound to say it because of the odium attached to his non-conformity. But the church which needlessly makes such confession difficult puts a useless temptation in the way of candor and unbought allegiance to Christianity.

For the first five years, the great majority of young ministers have all they can do to maintain themselves in their first parishes with all the help they can command. But, weighted by the odium of dissent, ability, culture, sincerity, and devotion will seldom avail to save them. We ought not, willingly, to put such a strain upon the conscience or so confound the issues of truth.—Liberal Christian, Nov. 21, 1874.

ROMANISM VERSUS KNOWLEDGE.

As illustrating the attitude of English Roman Catholics toward the great universities, a correspondence has been published between the father of an Oxford under-graduate and Archbishop Manning. The young man had been two years a member of New College, Oxford, when he became a convert to the Roman Catholic faith. He wished, as did also his father for him, that he might continue his university course. How he came to change his course is told in a letter to his father, in which he says:—

"Since I saw you I have been in London to see the Archbishop of Westminster, and to learn from him the mind of the Church as relating to my future course. When I had laid the whole matter before him, I assure you I was much surprised to hear that the Holy See has expressly condemned the English universities as dangerous to faith and morals. This being the case, the arbhbishop could only give me one reply to my question—an unconditional negative; and as I have submitted my judgment to that of the Church, the only course for me is to acquiesce in his opinion."

Upon this the father wrote to the archbishop to learn whether his son had rightly understood the archbishop's meaning, and he adds: "I can scarcely think it possible that a church professing to encourage learning should object to a young man of twenty-one completing his education at a university from which all sectarian teaching is excluded." A reply was received from Archbishop Manning's secretary in which, without an express affirmation of the correctness of the son's report, the father is given to understand that the Church does prohibit Catholics from studying at the English universities. The letter proceeds: "The archbishop desires to express through me his sense of the trial you have at this time to bear. The cause of it cannot be regarded by him except as a benediction for your son; nevertheless, he cannot refrain from expressing his sympathy with you, who feel otherwise."—Advertiser.

OLD STONES.

To the Editors of the Boston Daily Advertiser:—

I read with great interest the announcement in your paper, made by Tiffany & Co., that they have a few old stones from India, which are now, it seems, but rarely met with.

Will you announce that I have several old stones on the roof of my kitchen, which I am willing to part with at rates even lower than Messrs. Tiffany can sell theirs for.

These are not South African stones. They were thrown on the kitchen roof when my next neighbor was blasting for his cellar.

They are much older than Messrs. Tiffany's stones. All of those are carbon—and their comparatively recent date is shown by that fact. My stones were stones before an atom of carbonic acid had assumed solid form; indeed, they date back almost to the tohu vabohu, beyond which even Tyndall does not go.

They are also much larger than any stones on Messrs. Tiffany's catalogue.

I should feel so badly if any person should purchase "low-priced African stones" without looking at mine, that I beg for an early insertion of this announcement. Respectfully yours,

J. Esterhazy,
39 Golconda Street, Roxbury.

P. S.—For the convenience of persons in New York, or elsewhere, careful selections from stock will be sent on approval.—Boston Advertiser.

Lord Holland, who was anxious to have a portrait of Sydney Smith, asked him to sit to Landseer; the reply of the witty canon came quick: "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?"

A PORTRAIT BUST OF THE LATE CHARLES SUMNER.

Mr. Sidney H. Morse, a sculptor, of Boston, who has attained considerable celebrity as a modeller of portrait busts, has recently finished a head of the late Charles Sumner, which in many respects is a striking work. Although the bust has been modelled since the death of Mr. Sumner, and the sculptor was forced to draw from memory or photographic material for some of the details of his work, yet his familiarity with the man as a lecturer and public speaker has enabled him to secure a likeness which the most intimate friends of the dead Senator concede to be faithful and expressive.

The face is carefully modelled, and bears in a marked degree the expression which characterized Mr. Sumner when speaking. The expression of the eyes is particularly spirited, and lends a feeling of life and action to the head, and this, combined with the carefully-studied lines of the mouth, conveys with great accuracy the leading characteristics of the man. This bust is to be published in its present form at an early day, and no doubt it will be eagerly sought after by the numerous admirers of the late Senator from Massachusetts. Mr. Morse has also executed a fine portrait bust of the late Theodore Parker, and medallions of President Grant and Horace Greeley. Some very fine photographs of the bust of Sumner, taken from various points of view by Warren of Boston, have also been published.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Subscribers will hereafter please remit twenty cents for a year's postage in advance to THE INDEX office, instead of paying this sum to their local post-offices as heretofore.

Our New Zealand subscriber will please accept our thanks for a copy of the Otago Guardian, of September 29. It is published daily at Dunedin, is a large eight-page sheet of eight columns to the page, and is edited in as good style as any Boston or New York paper.

Disraeli, in his novel Lothair, satirically takes off a pseudo-reformer of high rank in this style: "Notwithstanding the apathy which had been engendered by premature experience, St. Aldegonde held extreme opinions, especially on political affairs, being a republican of the reddest dye. He was opposed to all privilege, and indeed to all orders of men, except dukes who were a necessity. He was also strongly in favor of the equal division of all property, except land. Liberty depended on land, and the greater the land-owners, the greater the liberty of a country. He would hold forth on this topic even with energy, amazed at any one differing from him. 'As if a fellow could have too much land!' he would urge, with a voice and a glance which defied contradiction."

Herbert Spencer refutes Proudhon's celebrated maxim, "Property is robbery," in a very ingenious and original manner. He says: "If all property is robbery, then among other consequences it follows that a man can have no right to the things he consumes for food. And if these are not his before eating them, how can they become his at all? As Locke asks, When do they begin to be his? when he digests? or when he eats? or when he boils? or when he brings them home? If no previous act can make them his property, neither can progress of assimilation do it; not even their absorption into the tissues. Wherefore, pursuing the idea, we arrive at the conclusions that, as the whole of his bones, muscles, skin, etc., have been thus built up for nutriment, not belonging to him, a man has no property in his own flesh and blood—can have no valid title to himself—has no more claim to his own limbs than he has to the limbs of another—and has as good a right to his neighbor's body as his own."

Our genial neighbor, the Christian Register, weeps over the discovery that, in the new Year Book, "Francis E. Abbot heads the array of clerical life-members" of the American Unitarian Association! We own the soft impeachment. Some years ago, we were astonished by receiving a certificate of life-membership in that institution, stating that Mr. [now Professor] William Everett had paid thirty dollars for it to the Association on our behalf. It is, verily, a goodly company to be in; and possibly our diploma will be accepted at the Day of Judgment as a ticket of admission to the New Jerusalem. Nevertheless, we should feel like a sneak-thief to fool Saint Peter with that bit of parchment, and should prefer to go off with the image-breakers and baggage-smashers. Since we see but one way to relieve our neighbor's distress, we will use our best endeavors to hunt up and restore the forgotten document, provided the Association will refund the thirty dollars to Professor Everett! Will the Executive Committee take the hint, or do the thirty pieces of silver stick to its tenacious palm?

INSPIRATIONS AND ANODYNES.

Life at its best is full of exertion and exhaustion, toil and drudgery, trouble and difficulty, pain and sorrow. In greater or smaller proportion, such things as these enter as elements into every human career, and can be permanently escaped by none. Perhaps a large majority of men and women pass their days, on the average, with more of happiness than unhappiness; there is a constant beauty and light in the world, despite all shadows and deformities. But the man who has never lain down in utter weariness, or risen up in resistance and protest, in the presence of dark experiences, is possible only in dreamland, and never trod the ground of solid reality.

There is an elasticity in human nature which enables it to endure under actual pressure what in prospect or retrospect may seem unendurable. In one way or another we all contrive to bear the heats and frosts, the winds and storms of life, without giving up in despair or seeking refuge in suicide. There are many bruised hearts, but few broken ones; there are many tired heads and hands, but few that are totally paralyzed. According to their varying natures, men and women struggle through the ills of life, beating out a path of their own and seldom absolutely succumbing. Although, when looked at in perspective, the future burden or misery seems utterly intolerable, the soul finds that, on its arrival, the load is distributed over many days, weeks, or years, and seldom bears with its whole crushing weight on any single moment; just as the "discontented pendulum" in the fable was dismayed at the thought of being doomed to tick so many million times, and was only reässured by remembering that a full second would always be given it to tick in.

Men reconcile themselves to their lots in many ways, good or bad as the case may be. They may brace themselves to sustain the hardships of life by their own inherent strength, or they may think they derive the requisite strength from external sources of various sorts; but in this latter case they may deceive themselves, and often do. We can only meet difficulties with such strength as we have, and, if we have it, it is our own. In the last analysis, all our own strength is derived from universal Nature, whether we go for courage to a jug of poisonous whiskey or rely upon the power of philosophy and religion. Let us consider some of the inspirations and anodynes of human life.

Some men accept toil and trouble as the result of inexorable necessity, against which all battling is useless. They may conceive of it as unconscious Destiny or Fate, operating in total disregard of human wishes or welfare and exacting submission, free or forced, to the absolutely inevitable; or they may conceive it as the omnipotent "will of God," not heedless or heartless, but governed by considerations beyond the highest reach of human thought. In either case, whether this ultimate necessity is conceived as natural or supernatural, they submit because they cannot help themselves, on the principle that "what can't be cured must be endured." Stoical fortitude of this sort is often to be met with, disguised under religious phrases, yet really identical in nature with that which nerves many persons not commonly regarded as religious to meet the inevitable. Whoever encounters labor or pain simply because he must, and looks upon this necessity as an incomprehensible fact to be accepted with the best grace possible, submits to a cosmical government of pure force; and it makes little difference whether he considers it inexorable fatality or the "immutable decrees" of God. One alternative is as rigorous as the other, and simple submission to superior power appears to be the only possible course to him who would not insanely dash his head against the prison walls of his destiny. But there is little in this to inspire, or cheer, or console. Man is a slave, and may as well be a slave to Necessity as to God, if God's arbitrary will is the ultimate reason of all things. Such a conception of life may deaden pain by a sort of spiritual anæsthesia; but it can hardly make man the free sovereign of his own soul, or inspire him with the spirit of heroism.

Other men look upon the drudgeries, hardships, and griefs of life as the road to an eternal heaven, and doubtless draw great comfort and inspiration from the thought. They are filled with an adoring "love of Christ," imagine him viewing their pains and struggles with a divinely human sympathy, and lean on him for support in every great emergency. The practical power of Christianity, so long as it is held with undoubting faith and real self-devotion, is beyond all question; the saints are few, but there are enough of them to show that the Christian religion is a fountain of inspiration to those that can suppress their intellectual nature so far as to be enthusiastically persuaded of its truth. Provided its terrible untruth to enlightened reason and unperverted conscience can be overlooked, there is no doubt of its power to meet and satisfy to the full the demands of the heart; and all who set these demands first and foremost are to be pitied, if they find themselves driven by intellectual honesty to surrender their Christian faith. "Outside of Christianity" is no place for those who cannot hold truth as infinitely more precious than emotional satisfactions. The "faith of Christ" can exalt, inspire, soothe, delight, and spur to almost incredible self-sacrifice; but it has its price—the extinction of that noble passion for truth which leads straightway out of the Christian fold, and finds no home except in the temple of Science.

There are countless other ways in which men find courage wherewith to face the calamities and endure the hard labors of life; but we will not dwell on them now. What we wish is to point out some of the higher inspirations which are the gracious accompaniments of Free Religion.

To set the intellect above the "heart" as its natural guide, director, and controller (and this is what Free Religion must and does do), is not to destroy it; on the contrary, every element of human nature reaches its highest possible perfection only when its natural relationships are scrupulously respected, and the heart is best developed when it does not usurp the special function of the intellect—the determination of truth. In their natural exercise, the affections are the great staple inspiration of human lives; they create homes and sustain them; they cement noble companionships and make them minister to all else that is noble; they give purpose, motive, and dignity to the common pursuits of men; they constitute the basis of all human society, the common bond that prevents it from being destroyed by the fierce competitions of selfishness. The love of wife, husband, parent, child, brother, sister, friend, neighbor, mankind,—what else makes drudgery sweet, and fills the wearisome details of business with a divine significance that challenges even the idealist's reverence and admiration? The world would stagnate but for this perennial inspiration of human love, which is as little remembered as the sunshine we walk in or the air we breathe. Love finds its home here among men; it is a denizen of our own planet, and gets lost in empty space, when it is despatched on astronomical expeditions among the stars. If it is set to work answering theological questions, or dictating conclusions to the intellect in the sphere of science or philosophy, it is made a disturber and not an inspirer, and deserves the ejection it is sure sooner or later to incur. But as the creator of all that is most beautiful in life, the stimulus to grand exertions, the fountainhead of magnificent toil and peerless achievement and glorious self-sacrifice, love holds the first place among the permanent inspirations of common human life; and this Free Religion is the first to recognize.

The great ideal of duty is another of these permanent inspirations. To what nobleness has it not spurred generous spirits? What victories over grinding tasks, immense labors, frightful perils, costly sacrifices, is it not perpetually achieving in obscure and lowly lives all about us? There is no need of Bible or Church, Pope or Christ; these sublimities of moral greatness are commoner than cobble-stones, yet precious as the diamonds of Golconda. The proof of the power of duty, as an ever-present inspirer in the world of daily experience, is so patent that it is unheeded; and we are sent roaming round the world to discover what lies at our very doors. Christianity may point to its artificial enthusiasms, its asceticisms, its contempts for natural motives, its paroxysms and ecstasies of love for Christ, its martyrdoms and missionaryings and all such triumphs of faith over men's hearts; but who that has an open eye for the quiet, unpretentious fidelity to duty which grows up like grass wherever mankind are found cannot match its marvels, ten to one, out of the common humanity that the churches consider themselves sent to "redeem"? Duty inspires wherever it is felt; and it is felt wherever society is found, or else society could not exist. Shall we go into the churches to buy our daylight?

Again, to one that can comprehend the power of great ideas, or thrill to their inexhaustible inspiration, how vapid, stale, and cheap are the artificial stimuli of Christian mythology! Plant the thoughts of Truth, Justice, Freedom, Humanity, and so forth, in any mind; let them grow, and strike root, and bear their natural fruit; and no "Tree of Life" ever furnished richer nutriment to man or angel. They feed the sources of all disinterested toil for the good of others; they have made the world's reformers, great and little; they have spurred the world's discoverers to risk fortunes and lives to secure what benefited others alone; and they have nothing to do with "Jesus Christ and him crucified." The massive figures in human history, the men and women who were cast in colossal mould and mightily impelled the wheels of progress, are proofs of the omnipotence of ideas to arouse, sustain, and inspire. Their universality emancipates the mind that dwells on them from the limitations of time and place, and lifts it up to a region where the petty disappears in the illimitable. The gods of Olympus fed on nectar and ambrosia; the idealist is nourished by a diviner diet still. Nothing so invigorates the mind, or expands it, as the love of great principles; they return a thousandfold reward for such devotion by bestowing the inspiration needed to redeem human life from its own littleness.

But while human love, duty, ideas, may be sufficient to give men motive and power for encountering toil and struggle, it may seem that even their great inspirations must be powerless in the presence of the terrible bereavements, griefs, and agonies which no life can long escape. At such times, the soul of man has boundless sorrows; and Christianity confidently claims the ability to supply them all. Perhaps it has, so far as they are concerned whose faith is as boundless as their sorrows; but even then we doubt it.

"Console, if you will; I can bear it;
'Tis a well-meant alms of breath;
But not all the preaching since Adam
Has made Death other than Death.

"That little shoe in the corner,
So worn and wrinkled and brown,
With its emptiness confutes you,
And argues your wisdom down."

No anodyne for sorrow which is not shallow can be found—not even Time, the great soother of human woes. The pierced heart must bleed; and wounds that are deep leave scars. Yet so far as alleviation is possible, it can be found in human love and sympathy, in the discharge of sacred duty, in the companionship of great and glorious thoughts. What thought is more great and glorious than the idea of conscious harmony with universal Being? This idea comes like balm to the man whose life is dedicated to the universal, and is inspired daily and hourly by willing co-operation with the great whole of Nature. Such an one is no slave of Fate. He freely re-enacts the universal law, and freely conforms his own life to what he himself recognizes as the best possible. He suffers, and in direct proportion to the depth and tenderness of his nature; yet, in the conviction that the whole course of things tends evermore to realize a better than had gone before, he finds such solace as comes from a conscious purpose to realize this better in himself, and drinks in the inspiration of the universal life. It is a gross imagination that pictures a rewarding Savior on the throne of the universe, dealing out eternal compensations for faith in himself; a nobler comfort springs from reverence for that Unity which binds all things in one, and creates in man's soul the possibility and purpose of identifying himself with it. This is better than blind submission under protest to the inevitable, though the inevitable is here; for he who consciously re-affirms within himself the same law that seems to crush him, and accepts the actual as also the best possible, converts the inevitable into his own servant, and makes himself the master of Fate. Not to every one may it be given to-day to comprehend this inner sovereignty of the soul that inspires it to conquer its own conquerors, and rise superior to all the accidents of life; yet none the less real is it to those who have it, and none the less genuine is the inspiration it imparts. Let no one pity him who finds such consolations as these in the world of ideas, or deem that visionary which is the sublimest truth.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

We are all interested just now in the revival of a hoped bit of persecution which we had fondly It is dead and buried.

D. D., Bi years ago since John William Colenso, attack thro f Natal, was the subject of virulent and in every t the length and breadth of our land, ianity was made country or colony where Christ- The orst "he ome.

in h nying the " of the good bishop consisted aic authorship of the Pentateuch, his exposure of the unhistorical, and therefore untrue, character of much that it contained; and, lastly—the head and front of his offending,—his publishing a hymn-book without a single hymn addressed to Christ.

During the interval of his absence from England, so great is the progress which has been made in free thought that the bishop's views on the Bible have been widely adopted, and much of the opposition to his views about Christ has been exchanged for secret and avowed sympathy. Seldom has his name been mentioned but with respect and honor, of late years.

But unexpected events in the Colony of Natal have brought the bishop over to England once more—and this time not on theological or controversial matters, but simply to bring before the home government a case of what he deems to be injustice and hardship, and a miscarriage of law against a Zulu chief.

Into the merits of this case I will not here enter, more than to say that I had strong suspicions that the bishop had needlessly exposed himself to animadversion from European colonists in Natal, as I had heard the story from the lips of one of his own followers who had estates in the settlement. After reading the bishop's book on Langalibaleh I became entirely convinced that sufficient injustice had been done to warrant him in his noble determination to fight single-handed on behalf of the injured chief.

I am happy to say that the colonial office here endorse his conclusions, and are resolved to remedy the wrong done as far as it is possible to do so.

Being in England, however, the bishop could not expect to be left entirely out of the animated sphere of religious matters; and so more than one of his clerical friends have requested him to occupy their pulpits.

On a visit to Oxford, he was invited to preach in Carfax Church (at which the mayor and corporation officially attended) on the day appointed for a general missionary crusade.

As neither the Bishop of Natal nor any of his friends choose to do these things "on the sly," or to resort to any petty method of defeating lawful authority, the intention was made public at once, in order to give due notice of it to the "powers that be."

As might have been expected, no opposition was raised on the part of the Evangelicals, who are growing wiser, and whose time and energies are now occupied by the treacherous Ritualists.

The latter, however, as represented by the English Church Union,* brought the matter before the Bishop of Oxford (Mackarness), and, whether from sympathy with the memorialists or fear of offending them, he at once issued an inhibition forbidding Bishop Colenso to preach in his diocese.

This extremely Christian and foolish conduct, of course, had the effect of arousing still further public attention to the bishop's proceedings; and the sequel showed that the English Church Union people had outwitted themselves.

Bishop Colenso did not preach, but the Rector of Carfax (Mr. Netcher) read the bishop's sermon instead, and thus not only practically defeated the adversary, but added tenfold to the interest and attention which it received. Moreover, in the same afternoon, Bishop Colenso preached in the Chapel of Balliol College, Oxford, over which presides as Master the celebrated Dr. Jowett, a man whose influence is enormous, and who is deeply beloved by all who have the privilege of knowing him.

You must know that the college chapels are independent of Episcopal control; and this is the case with one or two other places of worship in the country which belong to the English Church. Amongst these is Westminster Abbey, over which Dean Stanley with his canons exercises an absolute control.

Though it is even a metropolitan church and in the heart of London, the Bishop of London has no right of entry or jurisdiction over it.

It is not to be wondered at, then, that Dean Stanley has invited Bishop Colenso to preach in the Abbey at one of the special services. Last Sunday he placed Dr. Caird (of the Scotch Church) in the pulpit; and about this time last year, as you will remember, Max Müller, a lay professor at Oxford, occupied the same post of honor.

Some indignant little church papers call loudly for the intervention of the Archbishop of Canterbury, but all to no purpose; they might as well appeal to the vergers, or to the crossing-sweeper at the gates, to overrule the authority of the Dean.

Moreover, there is a tacit sympathy and understanding between the Archbishop and the Dean, so that it may be generally believed that whatever the Dean does the Archbishop would be pretty sure to approve. (Hence the continuous stream of spite poured forth against Archbishop Tait by the High Church organs.)

As my letter is about the Bishop of Natal, I cannot do better than conclude it with an extract from Dean Stanley's sermon last Sunday, in which he eulogizes Bishop Colenso in words which will receive from many hearts a most cordial response:—

After speaking of the philanthropic spirit and the sympathy with native races, as exemplified in English statesmen and governors, in David Livingstone and in Bishop Patterson, the preacher continued: "Such an one (if I may for a moment speak of one who in this respect stands in the foremost rank of living missionaries) is the South African bishop who, of all who have gone to that distant land, has given to it the fullest and largest share of his laborious life; who was among the first of the colonial bishops to translate the Holy Scriptures into the native language of those whom he was sent out to instruct; who, by dealing with his simple converts, not as inferiors, but as companions and fellow-Christians, had the grace to learn from them with a new force some old truths, which, though sometimes pushed to excess, have since been, in principle, almost accepted at home; who stands conspicuous among the missionaries of our time for the noble self-forgetfulness with which he has sacrificed his dearest prospects, and severed valuable friendships cemented by the most trying circumstances, in order to vindicate the rights of a barbarian tribe, which (whether with or without ground, I do not say) he believed to have been unjustly treated through the misapprehension or misjudgment of his fellow-colonists. Such a sacrifice, made fearlessly and freely, while others, from whatever motive, have either kept silence or swelled the popular panic, is an example of missionary enterprise and of Christian chivalry which, wholly apart from any question of theological opinion, the Church of England is justly proud to claim, and ought on this day, when we call over, as it were, the roll of missionary martyrs and confessors, to commend to the honor which it deserves, and which it will, we doubt not, receive in the sight of Him who seeth not as man seeth—in the judgment of Him who has said of any kindness done to a friendless stranger, even though it be an African savage, 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.'"

I am, sir, very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE, Dulwich, S. E., Dec. 5, 1874.

*The real secret of the opposition of the Ritualists is not to be found in Bishop Colenso's criticism of the Old Testament, but in the fact that Bishop Gray, of Cape Town, went through the farce of excommunicating him.

BISHOP HAVEN, of the Methodist church, who has expressed his approval of the Christian Amendment movement, in a sermon delivered on December 6 in Boston, made some frank acknowledgments, which the Advertiser thus reported: "He said that the great ideas of the world were often concentrated into single words. The word 'independence' expressed our national history. The word 'apostle' was the whole essence of the gospel. It embodied the whole scheme of salvation. It meant 'sent forth.' It was in direct antagonism to any system of religion which rises out of human nature. It implied two things—something from which it was sent, and something to which it was sent. That gospel, that Christian religion, was something sent from God to man. It did not spring from humanity. There was no possibility of human nature in itself having a conception of salvation through Jesus Christ. That knowledge of Jesus Christ would be communicated to him supernaturally. Therefore the whole system of salvation was based on that simple word, 'apostle.' The first apostle was Christ himself. Had there been no sending forth out of heaven there would have been no sending forth on the earth. Had it not been for Christ's coming there would have been no church on the earth. The true apostolic succession was the church. Every church was planted by somebody. The two oldest churches—the Greek Church and Roman Church—were founded by the apostles. These was not a church in America not founded on the apostolic word. The great Congregational Church was sent forth into the wilderness of New England. So with the Baptist and the Methodist. Now that could be said of nothing but the Christian religion. Other things might grow of themselves, but the church had to be sent forth. As it was made so it had to make. A church could not exist as a church and not be apostolic or missionary. The Methodists had been filled with that idea, and had spread their churches all over the land. They had covered all the United States, and they were extending through all the world. They had got to extend their lines to Paris, to Rome, to Spain, to Africa. They must send out their missions, or they could not live. But to do that they had to have money. If they had money they would soon have all Europe, all Asia, all Africa in their hands. God so blessed the church that with a single seed they could produce a hundredfold. In closing, Bishop Haven made a fervent appeal for contributions toward the missionary cause."

HELPING OTHERS.

Much has been said, much written, on the subject of "reforms." Many earnest men and women are laboring with heart and hand to raise their poor, degraded, fallen brothers and sisters; to carry light and comfort into many a cheerless home and to many a sad heart,—and may God bless their every effort! We are constantly sending out missionaries to those whom we in our presumption call "the heathen"—but have we ever thought that there is another class to whom we need to send missionaries? Has any one dared to enter the homes of our "merchant princes," our rich bankers, and others of that ilk, and speak the truth to them; dared to tell them that they are the cause, to a great degree, of the crime that disturbs our social order? Daily, men and women are imprisoned, or in some way punished, who, from sheer despair of gaining bread for themselves and their starving families by honest means, commit some petty theft. Do you who live in luxurious homes believe that the heart that beats in yonder dirty, ragged beggar's breast is less warm and loving than your own, or less capable of intense suffering? If so, you are mistaken. I have found many a heart covered only with rags, which was warmer and nobler than some that wear nought but silk or satin.

We say crime must be stopped; but are we doing the best thing to stop it; have we reached the root of the evil when we punish every poor culprit, when we go into the homes of the bad and tell them to be honest, and talk to them of God, the great, loving Father? I don't deny that all this is right and good, but question if it goes deep enough, if there is not something better yet. It is of course necessary to tear out all the little fibrous roots of evil, but it is necessary also that we destroy the main root that is sapping the moral vitality of humanity. We are constantly reading of defaulters, of murders committed in the hope of gain, and all the long list of dreadful crimes, until it makes one almost heart-sick to open the daily papers. And these crimes are not committed alone by the ignorant, the degraded, but by men in what we call "good standing." Why, we ask, do they need to steal, murder, or become defaulters? Because no one has dared to send missionaries to the heathen in our very midst, to speak the truth to our rich men and women, our church-members and deacons; because no one has dared to attempt the purification of the "whited sepulchres" filled with all manner of filth and impurity, and poisoning the whole moral atmosphere of society. You say I speak boldly? But I have looked deep into the great, throbbing, suffering heart of humanity. I know what wealth is; I know what poverty is. Not a few have come to me and laid bare the secrets of their poor, bleeding, suffering hearts. I speak, therefore, as no mere theorizer, but from deep experience, from a strong sympathy with my poor, oppressed, and suffering sisters and brothers.

Ye rich men and women who sit in your luxurious homes, who never felt cold or hunger, how dare you condemn him who, unable to earn the means of subsistence for his starving little ones,—who, let me tell you, are just as precious to him as your own pampered darlings are to you,—steals one paltry loaf to save the lives so precious to him! I tell you that some of you are committing greater thefts, are far greater criminals in the sight of God and all true men and women than he,—living as you are in luxury paid for by the money coined from the heart-blood of laboring men and women,—making your immense profits, and paying your clerks and other employés the smallest salaries you can get them for; get them because they must have something. You expect them to dress and live in a way that will do no discredit to you, and yet you do not give them the means for doing it; and so they steal; and then you brand them as thief, take away what you never can give back—their good name. I do not deny that there are many extravagant men and women in that class, but that does not make it right for you to defraud them of their just dues. I say just dues, because any man or woman who does his or her work well and faithfully has a right to live and live well. I often hear it said, "Such an one was not obliged to accept my terms." Did you ever walk, day after day, seeking employment, until weary and worn,—yourself needing food, with perhaps others dear to you dependent upon you for bread, for life, even? You were doubtless glad to accept any offer that would keep the "grim wolf" from the door. But if you never have had any such experience, then you have no right to condemn another for being weak before a temptation which you have not felt, and know nothing of.

You call these unfortunate ones "poor, miserable, ignorant, degraded wretches;" and yet you demand of them higher principles, purer morals, and a nobler life than you display. You place every temptation before them, and then punish them for not resisting it. You forget that all are not strong morally any more than physically. You teach your little child to walk, guiding its unsteady feet, cheering it, encouraging it; if it make a misstep and fall you do not punish it, but tell it to try again, holding it a little more firmly perhaps, yet not roughly. But is it thus you treat your employés, who perhaps are but children morally? Do you go among them, speak a kind, encouraging word, win their confidence, make them feel that you are their friend, one to whom in their hour of need they can go for help and comfort; or do you make them feel that your only interest in them is to get as much work out of them and pay them as little as possible? Has there never come to you a temptation too strong for you to resist; have you never seen the hour when a kind word would have saved you from a step you ought never to have taken? Could you not dispense with some of the luxuries in your home, and suffer nothing; and by taking the cost of them, and dividing it among your employés, add much to their comfort, make their hearts lighter, and win their love and esteem? Try it one year and see if you are not happier, if you are not better served, and your clerks more honest. If it chance, as it sometimes may, that one is extravagant, not living as he or she should, speak to such kindly, help them if in trouble, encourage them to do better. Remember that "human nature is human nature," that some are weaker than others, while their hearts may be just as pure. To such give more aid; reach out a strong, kind, but firm hand; and as far as possible keep all temptation out of their way. Remember that all must have some pleasure, some recreation to make them healthy and happy. Suppose you give every one in your employ a ticket to some good course of lectures, some pleasant, proper enjoyment; little as it would take from your comfort, think how much it would add to theirs, how much more heartily and willingly they would serve you if they felt you had some interest in them. Meet them now and then either at your own homes or in some other suitable place; meet them as friends, talk over your mutual interests; don't patronize them, but let them feel that they are men and women, not mere machines. Nothing is more galling or more humiliating to a proud, true, man or woman than a sense of being patronized. Circumstances may have deprived them of wealth, but it does not necessarily make them less noble and refined, or take away their sense of the beautiful.

I know of no surer way to take away a person's self-respect than to lower the price of their honest labor and then give them something, making them feel like paupers, and putting yourself in the light of a generous benefactor when in truth you are little better than a thief. Do you think because a person is poor that he has no sense of justice, no feeling of self-respect, no pride or delicacy of feeling? Pay every one his price for honest labor; make a fair, generous bargain, to which be true yourself and require them to be. Then if you wish to make them a present do so; but don't give them as a present what is only their just due. Place yourself in their position, and do as you would wish to be done by under like circumstances. I have known many a one give to some poor person something of no use to themselves, yet not at all suited to the other's wants or position,—like an old silk dress, some bit of finery; thus fostering in the poor a taste for dressing beyond their means, when they ought to be encouraged to dress plainly and neatly and according to their circumstances. I said give; I should have said sell, for in most such cases the poor recipient is expected to lower the price for her work in consequence. Better put your old finery in the rag-bag, and with the money it brings buy a plain, neat calico dress, or some good, useful article for household use, and give that, rather than encourage the desire which our poorer classes have for gaudy, unsuitable clothing.

I hear some say: "I have but little myself; I have nothing to give, and yet I long to do something." My friend, you can give a smile, a kindly word of encouragement. Speak kindly and pleasantly to such as are servants; if done properly it will never make them impertinent or familiar. Show some interest in their little plans, their work, and their pleasures; encourage them to be cheerful, honest, and economical, to dress plainly and neatly; and, if you give them anything, be sure that it is in accordance with their circumstances and your own teachings. Educate their love of beauty by your gifts; a pretty calico costs no more than a homely one, a bright neck ribbon no more than a dull, dingy one. Try to make them feel contented. If their lot be a hard one, their life sad, help them to bear it; let them look a little into the lives of others, which they think are filled with nothing but sunshine. The poor are very apt to think the rich have no troubles, no sorrows; would it not be better to sometimes lift the veil for them? Let them see that wealth does not heal every wound; that, after all, your sorrows are not unlike their own. Most of them will appreciate such kindness and love and serve you better. Some may not, but to such even you have done no harm.

As I said in the beginning, I speak from experience. I have not a mere theory in my head. I am telling you only what I have seen tried by others, and have tried myself. I believe that the rich men and women, church-members, deacons, and even ministers, are guilty of much of the sin and crime in the world. I care not how many thousands you may give in charity, you are not living right; and I tell you that the poor, the ignorant, and degraded are not fools. They look to your lives, not your empty words. Do you imagine they see not through your thin veil of hypocrisy, see not the difference between your words and lives, when you call yourselves "poor, miserable sinners," speak of the things of this world as of little worth, utter all the cant phrases heard in churches and prayer-meetings, and then go forth to live impure, unprincipled lives; to cheat all you can without making yourselves liable to the law; to grind the poor that you may have more luxuries and fill your coffers with gold? Do you think the poor, those struggling for mere subsistence, do not see it all and despise you; that it does not make them bitter, and take all the joy and sweetness out of their hearts and souls? Don't try to talk religion to them while your life is a lie, while you are but "whited sepulchres" far more filthy than many a beggar in the streets. If you would have less crime among the lower and poorer classes, then purify your own lives. You pride yourselves on your refinement, your education, your elevation above the masses; but you expect far more of them than you, with all your aids and advantages, attempt. I was deeply pained, not long since, to learn that one I have ever looked upon as a grand, noble man; one who gives largely to all charities, whose name is frequently in the papers as a noble benefactor to his race, who is held in high esteem by the public,—that this man has ever been a hard and uncompromising man with his employés, paying them low wages, and seldom giving them a kindly word. Yet there are thousands of such men. Go through our city stores; see the stolid, unhappy, weary-looking men and women who are obliged to stand on their feet all day, for the mere whim of their employers. It is enough to kill any woman; and every merchant who allows it, much more insists upon it, ought himself to be put in a tread-mill. As if it made any difference to customers whether on entering a store they found the clerks sitting or standing! Indeed, if the clerks had only a little more rest, they would be better able to serve their customers with alacrity and a pleasant look. Some people seem to think they are not properly served unless the servant be made as uncomfortable as possible. I wish the ladies would form a league, and refuse to trade at any store where the clerks, especially the women clerks, are not provided with seats. Men call women, in their sneering way, the "weaker vessel," and yet expect her to bear more than they can. I once heard a good physician say, "A tired man does not begin to know what a tired woman is;" and he spoke the truth.

Why can not all try, as far as is in their power, to make the burdens, the sorrows, trials, and temptations of each and all lighter? If we cannot give money we can give something else. Each and all can do something for poor, suffering humanity. We are none of us living as we ought. Let us therefore purify our own hearts and lives, do all we can for the poor and suffering, and leave the rest with God.

PHRENOLOGY AND CHRISTIANITY.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

The following letter was sent to the Phrenological Journal, but its publication has been declined. Thinking that many of the readers of THE INDEX are also readers of the Journal, and acquainted with the principles of phrenology, I offer the letter to your columns. The arguments are rather suggested than developed in my letter, as I aimed to be very brief; but I do not think my position will be misunderstood by many. Mr. Wells offers in the December number of the Journal a prize of a hundred dollars for the best article harmonizing Phrenology and Faith, to be submitted to the committee appointed to decide the merits of the competing efforts by the first of February, 1875. The best ability in the phrenological school of thinkers will doubtless be given to the public through the Journal soon, in an attempt to prove that there is no real conflict between this branch of modern science and Christianity. H. C. N.

OZARK, Mo., Nov. 7, 1874.

MR. S. R. WELLS:

Dear Sir,—Some time ago I began to write an article for the Phrenological Journal on the relation of phrenology to the Christian religion, but was prevented from finishing my communication. Some expressions of yours in the Journal of November concerning "Christmas" make me desirous of offering a brief criticism on your attitude to Christianity. You say: "Our field of study is that of science rather than that of theology; but we are bound to affirm that there is nothing in all the realm of human knowledge that is not in harmony with, and subordinate to, the Christian religion."

Now what is Christianity, and to what authority shall we go to learn its doctrines? Is any source more satisfactory than the teachings of Christ and his disciples, who are supposed to have been inspired to propagate his scheme of salvation? Christ taught that he was "the way of life," and that belief in his atoning power—not faith in the virtues that characterized his life, but faith in his sacrificial merits as the atonement for sin—was necessary to redemption. He did not even intimate that man might be saved through any other means than his name. He made no allowance for the natural scepticism of some minds of his own and future generations, but demanded the same implicit faith of all who would be delivered from "the wrath of God," and obtain "eternal life." Yet you propose through the science of phrenology to show "why one person is sceptical, and another a believer;" and, notwithstanding, you find "nothing in all the realm of human knowledge that is not in harmony with, and subordinate to, the Christian religion." When you find a person whose phrenological developments show him to be constitutionally sceptical, yet whose life is a constant exhibition of strict moral rectitude, whose heart beats with the tender impulses of human love and sympathy, do you admonish such of the insufficiency of natural virtue, and declare that "there is no other name (than Christ's) under heaven or among men whereby man can be saved"? Can you do less and be a consistent Christian? Did Christ abate the requirement of faith in favor of those whose phrenological deficiencies you say render them incapable of exercising an unfaltering belief in Christianity? Does your toleration of infidelity as a natural and necessary consequence of certain constitutions harmonize with Christ's curse him as unbelief?

Again, Christ not only taught that belief was necessary to the Mediator between God and fallen man, but he instituted ordinances whose performance he required of all who would become his followers and disciples with the benefits of his gospel. His last charge to his disciples was "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature; and he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Admitting the fundamental proposition of the Christian religion, that Christ was the Son of God, sent into the world to establish for mankind a plan of salvation which no other being in the universe was capable of accomplishing, can we deny the absolute necessity of any of the conditions on which he has promised this salvation; and hence are we not logically forced to recognize an indispensable efficacy in the rite of baptism in defining the prerequisites of Christian salvation? I should be interested to see how you would dispose of this rite in harmonizing reason and Christianity.

I could say much more on this subject and not exhaust my thoughts; but I shall refrain at present. If Christianity can be harmonized with the scientific and religious demands of the age, let us still cherish it as infallible truth; but we should not forget, in our zeal to preserve this great and venerable system of religious faith, whence it is derived, and that all the teachings of Christ and his inspired followers must be equally considered.

Very truly yours,
H. CLAY NEVILLE.

TRAVELLING KINGS.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

My dear Friend,—When will the time come that Presidents, Senators, Representatives, and Citizens will comprehend better what liberty and equality demand, and act more in accordance with the Declaration of Independence? The oath to support the Constitution of the United States reads: "I do solemnly swear that I will support the Constitution of the United States of America, and that I do absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty whatever, and particularly to Victoria, Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, of whom I was a subject."

But when a king or a prince comes here, our officials ape royal and aristocratic notions, make appropriations of $50,000, and spend the money of the tax-paying people for a hypocritical, troublesome, silly display. When the princes return home, they are likely to laugh, and think, like that English surgeon who composed Yankee Doodle: "How many poor people could receive the necessaries of life out of the $50,000 during this cold winter!" Furthermore, such appropriations give cheats good chances. If the President, with his now double salary, or aristocratic officials, like such parades, they have perfect liberty to make them; but they ought to do it at their own expense, or assess each other in the same way that rumor says they do to carry out election frauds. The fugitive slave, when he came to our free States, could travel as any free man or woman; we tried to teach him what liberty meant, as much as we knew of it; if he needed aid private individuals or societies gave it. Let us treat kings and potentates like any other citizen. International intercourse and courtesy are better attended to by treating all foreign citizens in the same manner as we expect them to treat us. If we desire trade with the people of the Sandwich Islands, or any other nation, let us trade fairly and honestly with them, and they are likely to seek commercial relations with us; and if we want a new island, let us treat it as we do our territories.

If our young princes and officials travel in foreign countries, they will not run the risk of being snubbed by royalty or aristocracy, if they let them sincerely alone! If all our so-called great men will travel everywhere as free and independent citizens, they will manifest more true dignity, spare themselves a great deal of trouble, and save the people's hard-earned money. As long as missionaries invade the Sandwich Islands, and sell tracts and Bibles for high prices to the natives, and cheat them, we may receive their king with all the royal pomp we know of, but the Islanders will not trust us. Let us hope and strive to act up to the principle that "all men are created free and equal"!

Yours sincerely,
CARL H. HORSCH.

DOVER, N. H., December 16, 1874.

"IGNORANT VOTERS."

MR. EDITOR:—

As an interested party, permit me to say a few words in regard to the letter of Rev. F. M. Holland copied from the Nation into THE INDEX of Dec. 17.

The correctness of Mr. Holland's statistics I do not doubt; but I must protest against the inferences he deduces therefrom. It is an excellent thing to be cautious, and count the cost of any undertaking before venturing upon it; but cautious conservatism has never pioneered the way for any reform.

It is very easy, and many think eminently proper, for the man of wealth to argue and discuss the statistics of pauperism and its causes before bestowing his moiety of alms; but the starving beggar who waits the disbursement of his charity before he can be relieved of his craving hunger may well be pardoned, if he grows impatient at what in his opinion is a mere waste of figures, argument, and time.

So, if I were a man and already in possession of what I consider my political "rights," I can very well imagine with what complacency and patience I could listen to Mr. Holland's statistics and inferences; but being a woman, and the beggar for my rights in this case, I too—with thousands of other women—may well be pardoned for growing impatient at these repetitions of worn-out or at least stale arguments, which can prove at best only transitory stumbling-blocks in the way of a true reform.

"These facts," Mr. Holland says, "are made much worse on account of the well-known difference between men and women, of equal culture otherwise, in degree of interest in politics."

I would like to know if Mr. Holland thinks that denial of the suffrage is likely to make women become more interested in politics. It is not, I think, in either masculine or feminine human nature to take an absorbing interest in those matters in which we have no immediate personal concern. The lobby-queens of Washington society are said to take a lively interest in political matters, and understand wire-pulling as well as any man; for if they have not a political, they have a pecuniary interest in governmental affairs. So if those young ladies of the Wisconsin State University were allowed to vote upon as well as study State affairs, there is at least a probability that the "painfully toilsome" and "reprehensibly inattentive" air and manner which so struck Mr. Holland might partake more of the eagerness manifested by the young men of the same institution.

If a certain standard of intelligence irrespective of sex could be made the only prerequisite to the right of suffrage, no woman would or could reasonably object; but so long as one man who is the intellectual inferior of any woman is allowed to vote, while that privilege is, against her desire, denied to her, in just so far is injustice done. S. A. U.

FREE-THOUGHT AT THE CENTENNIAL.

EDITOR OF INDEX:—

I believe it is a very general purpose on the part of religious organizations to take part in the Centennial Celebration at Philadelphia in 1876.

I would ask if the "Liberals" of the United States intend doing anything on that occasion; and, if they do, if a programme has been adopted.

Liberals are preëminently lovers of liberty everywhere; and it seems meet that they should take advantage of such an occasion to declare their belief and purposes.

It would be a fit time to honor the memories of a Jefferson, Franklin, Paine, Allen, and other worthies of the "times that tried men's souls," and to declare anew their idea of, and devotion to, freedom.

E. C. ALPHONSE.

[In the absence of general organic union among the Liberals of this country, there is no possibility of their being properly represented at the Centennial Exhibition. Though there are various minor organizations of them which may represent themselves on that occasion, there is no likelihood of any concert of action. No general "programme" can be adopted till there is some really representative body authorized to adopt it: which is not the case. If there were a really national organization, properly constituted for the only national object which concerns all Liberals equally,—namely, the protection and expansion of religious liberty,—we should strongly favor its taking part in the Centennial; but there is no such organization in existence, and Liberalism is still paralyzed for action by its inveterate centrifugalism. If it were only fired by a generous enthusiasm to universalize and consummate the American ideal of absolute freedom, Liberalism could celebrate the Centennial by great achievements; but it is not, and (pardon the word) waits to be kicked into discharging the public duty it will not always be able to evade.—ED.]

A WORD TO THE FRIENDS OF TRUTH AND LIBERTY.

FELLOW-LIBERALS:—

With the sure conviction that you all take a deep interest in the progress of truth, justice, and freedom, I proceed to present before you a case which, I sincerely trust, you will not permit to pass by without due consideration.

There are among the Scandinavians of this country large numbers who begin to see the miserable state of the prevailing religion, and who are earnestly longing for the first bright rays of the day when individuals shall no longer be hated and persecuted by their fellow-beings for their religious belief or non-belief; when the priests shall not be the only ones having a right to think for themselves, but when each and all shall have full liberty to think and judge in religious as well as all other matters.

This day is gradually approaching, but, Oh, how slowly! Persons having flung aside the soul-dwarfing bondage of creeds and dogmas, constitute, as yet, but a small handful compared with the large multitude called Christians; and these are scattered about like trees on the plain—an odd one appearing here and there, but so far apart that the one hardly knows that the other exists. The case being such, no progress can be made; for it is only in unity that there is strength, and here is—anything but unity.

In view of this, I have often wondered whether something could not be done towards connecting these dispersed sceptics and "infidels," as they are termed, and out of them form one body. The only and best plan that has suggested itself is, that a paper be published in one of the Scandinavian languages which should be devoted to the spread of general enlightenment, but especially to the development of free thought. In other words, it should be a paper laboring for the same grand object that THE INDEX is laboring for so nobly and so well. This plan I have determined to carry out, notwithstanding all obstacles. I shall next summer start a monthly paper which will be published in the Swedish language, and circulated throughout all parts of this as well as the trans-Atlantic countries. I am aware, however, that this undertaking will involve enormous expenses, considering the fact that it is not at all likely that it will receive subscribers enough the first year to support it; for the majority are yet superstitious. I therefore appeal to you, friends, in the name of the great cause we have in common, to aid me in this work. Among our opponents it is customary for congregations to aid each other in building churches and the like; cannot we unite and aid each other in promoting our glorious cause? We can; and I feel convinced that the will is not absent.

In a recent number of THE INDEX, I saw a list of some twenty-five Liberal Leagues. Now if only each of these would contribute, say, ten or twenty dollars towards this undertaking, it would be in a fair way to success. It would be but a small amount for each, yet how much good it might—nay, it would—result in! Again I ask, Will you aid us? If you will, remember that at least one man shall bear, until death, a heart full of gratitude for the deed; and perhaps hundreds of others shall do the same.

The money need not be sent until the first of May, next spring, but it would be desirable if all those who feel disposed to aid us would notify us thereof now, at the same time stating about how much may be expected. N. P. OLSON.

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn.

[We do not personally know Mr. Olson, but the spirit of this appeal must commend itself to every earnest liberal; and we trust that he will receive generous aid in his project.—ED.]

THE "REGULATION OF LIFE."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—In a letter to THE INDEX published some six weeks ago, Frederic R. Honey asks the question: "Has God told me what to do to regulate my life?"

Subsequently I requested an answer to this. But instead of any answer appearing, a letter is published in your issue of Dec. 17, containing a metaphysical disquisition on the properties of mind as distinguished from matter, more especially with reference to a certain unknown thing which the writer chooses to call the "Divine Mind." He closes the disquisition by stating that "he finds from this quarter 'abundant information as to how to regulate his life.'"

Now, Mr. Editor, are we to understand from this dark and mysterious hint that man gets the knowledge how to order his moral, intellectual, physical, and what Mr. Honey calls his "higher" nature, by observing the laws inherent in, or impressed on, matter (I don't care which he calls it); or has he discovered some secret method of getting the "abundant information" he speaks of?

The answer to this question in plain language is of as much importance to humanity at large as to

Yours inquiringly, SAMUEL R. HONEY.

NEWPORT, R.I., Dec. 20, 1874.

THE SOUTHERN SCHOOL QUESTION.

NEW ORLEANS, La., Dec. 16, 1874.

MR. ABBOT:—

I have sent you several clippings of late bearing upon the school question, but the enclosed is the only one I have offered for publication. Some time ago I referred to Senator Schurz' speeches on the mixed-school question, and to the fact that he was also a warm friend of Charles Sumner. You published Conway's letter to the Tribune, showing the result of the experiment a year or two ago. Yesterday they came near lynching Superintendent Boothby, and finally let him off in this way:—

Mr. Boothby was then permitted to leave, but not until he was ordered to sign the following document:—

"This is to certify that I will exert my influence to prevent the occurrence of any event similar to that occurring in the Girls' High School, upper district, or in any school in the city having reference to the mixture of white and colored pupils in the public schools.

"CHARLES W. BOOTHBY,
"Superintendent Sixth District, State of Louisiana."

You see how things are working. I have no children old enough to attend school, and hence have no personal interest. But it is part of the history of these eventful times. Perhaps, if you think proper to publish the enclosed, it will give an opportunity for some friend of Sumner to express himself on the points raised by the Republican's article.

Yours truly, W. F. PERKINS.

ORTHODOXY AND CHILDREN.

ED. INDEX:—

Allow me to add my testimony to the disastrous effects of the Orthodox teaching on the minds of little children.

I was educated in one of the most liberal sects, the Quakers; yet my life was made troubled and fearful for many years, by fears of the punishment I might even unwittingly merit. When very young indeed, I could not avoid questioning the grounds on which the Orthodox belief was based; and the utter impossibility of believing in Christ as the Son of God in the sense accepted by the Church, and as a sacrifice for our sins, was cause of many struggles and great suffering. Except for a strong and abundant vitality, despair would have been the result. For years I suffered at times great mental torture, scarcely daring to trust my own convictions, and yet unable to accept others. Let us teach our children that every person should be a law to himself in all matters of opinion.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

REASONS FOR USING THE EUREKA SPOOL SILK.

It is full length. It is full size. It is smooth and elastic, and is equally adapted to hand or machine use.

Many kinds of spool silk are a perfect fraud, being not only shorter in length, but a much finer size than they are represented to be, and of so poor a quality as to be unfit for use. The ladies will always find the Eureka Silk exactly as represented. Every spool is warranted, and the manufacturer's name indelibly branded on every spool. Call for it.

THE FREE SUNDAY ADVOCATE.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. VOYSEY has kindly consented to furnish every fortnight a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order.
